The great city expansion in the end will be horizontal rather than perpendicular. We shall have many knots, clustered about factorles and other enterprises, and we shall learn how to distribute the satisfactions in life rather than merely to assemble them. Before this time comes, we shall have passed our present insistence on so-called economic efficiency, as if it were the sole measure of a civilization, and higher ends shall come to have called economic efficiency, as if it were the sole measure of a civilization, and higher ends shall come to have called economic efficiency, as if it were the sole measure of a civilization, and higher ends shall come to have called economic efficiency, as if it is the common assumption that the solution of these problems lies in facilities of transportation, and, to an extent, this is true; but this assumption usually rests on the other assumption, that the method of the present city vortex is the method of the present city vortex i
