displaced the hen as the raiser of pouttry. No substitute has been found for her as an egg-layer, but man seems to have really improved upon her in mothering the young flock.

Modern brooders not only possess the advantages of caring for hundreds of chicks at a time, but they save the her's time and leave her free for more profitable employment. Brooders, too, protect the chicks better, are more raise more chicks and get more profits.

The first great advantage of hovers and brooders is that they will work any time. The winter is the same as the nice warm Spring to them. Thus the poultry raiser can select his own season and control his brooding so as to get his flock out in time to produce eggs when he wants them. Develop-ment of modern brooding devices so that they care for from one hundred to five hundred chicks means that the modern poultryman can raise poultry in thousands instead of flocks of a few dozens at the most, as he formerly had to do when hens were his dependence. The hovers and brooders built by reliable concerns run uniformly and, being machines, do their work in a mechanical manner, just as their owner wants them to do. They as their owner wants them to do. They stay where they are put, and are not missing when a rain comes up, or engaged in the dewy mornings in dragging their tender occupants to death through the wet grass. When they are not in use they can be stored away, and do not cost for useless maintery, and those of the best makers are simple, easily cared for and very dependable under all conditions.

Hovers' Superiority

Perhaps the best proof of the superi-ority of hovers and brooders over the hen may be found in the fact that be-fore these were developed there were practically no large farms devoted en-raisers.

Next week's article will tell how the trap nest can be used to best advantage. Look for it appearing exclusively next Saturday in the Telegraph.
