NEWEST CHAMPION SHAKING HANDS WITH THE GREATEST EX-CHAMPION

JESS WILLARD, NEW WORLD'S CHAMPION BOB FITZSIMMONS, GREATEST EX-CHAMPION

When Bob Fitzsimmons, greatest of the world's pugilistic champions since Queensberry fighting began, learned that Jess Willard would go through Baltimore on his way from Havana where he had taken the title held by Jack Johnson, he hurried to the station to be among the first to greet the new hero. Bob wore a silk hat and frock coat. He was resplendent, as resplendent as champions are expected to be. Willard was in the plain soft hat he bought when he was a white hope amid scores of white hopes who were the laughing stock of the pugilistic world. He wore the same old suit of clothes which cost him about $20 months before he was even matched with Johnson. Willard, in fact, had not been champion long enough to buy a silk hat and a frock coat, which are recognized as the regular uniform of champions and some statesmen.

Bob, who with his five feet eleven inches is a rather tall man, had to look up to talk to the new champion, who is six feet six inches, some seven inches taller than the great Cornishman. Bob was the smallest Queensberry champion the ring has known, weighing about 160 pounds when he beat Jim Corbett, March 17, 1897. Willard is said to have weighed 247 when he stepped into the ring with Johnson in Havana, April 5. After Willard reached New York he let it be known that he would don the regular uniform of champions as soon as he had the time to visit a good tailor. He insisted he would leave the White Lights and the Red Lights alone. "They won't get me," he said. "But they got most other champions," he was told. "Yes, I've heard about that, but the little farm in Kansas will take up all my spare time," he replied.
