THE FLOWER'S MISSION

A Decoration Day Story Told in Jingle.

One day in the place where the flowers grew, each little flower was feeling blue; you see they'd been plucked from each tiny home, and they knew that meant that far they should roam. "Oh, why must I leave this bush so fair?" sobbed Red, Red Rose, with a sigh of despair. "And why must I leave my green-leaf swing?" moaned Dainty Sweet Pea; "'It's a cruel thing to tear us away and send us out to dear knows where!" so she said with a pout. "And why must I leave my home so stately?" said Red Geranium. "Tis but lately I came to live there—now it's a shame I must leave it so soon. Pray who's to blame?" But although they all did scold and fret, although they wept and sorrowed—yet the cutting still went caimly on—and they could but moan, "We'll soon be gone; and if we only knew just where, we really would not so greatly care."

Soon, soon in a tub with water filled they found themselves, their sobbing stilled; for really it felt real nice and cool. Said Rose, "I'll not cry and make a fool of myself' til I see where we are taken." (But the flowers noticed she was shaking.) But not one of them peeped.

The morrow dawned both bright and fair, and cool and refreshing was the air; the flowers opened each tiny eye, said one and the other, "Oh, my, my, Nox well know where we are going—I hope to do good or make some one smile, or cheer up a sick holder just a short while." At last came the gardener with horse and with team and carried the dear flowers off—It just seemed as if they were traveling hundreds of miles, yet all of them wore the most wonderful smiles. At last they came to a market place, and a market stall did proudly grace. People came hurrying to and fro, where they were going none seemed to know, but everyone stopped where the flowers off—It just seemed as if they were traveling hundreds of miles, yet all of them wore the most wonderful smiles. At last they came to a market place, and a market stall did proudly grace. People came hurrying to and fro, whe

"Good-by" sang the flowers—"good-by we are parting. Out into the world you see we are starting." Said Forget-me-not, "Pray that we soon meet again, and remember, keep sweet in both sunsine and rain."

So each little bunch of the flowers went its way, thinking never more to see dear friends so gay, but before many hours had quickly sped by, they were reunited, and I'll tell you why.

You see it was the thirtieth of May—the day known to all as "MEMORIAL DAY," when where those lie we'll not see any more, on this earth—those who fought in the war, and where all dear friends lie—the flowers we bring, and lay them above the graves, so birds will sing, and the green, green grass on the graves will wave—on the graves of the loved and the true and the brave! So the cemetery will have no gloom; so into the very heart of the tomb will penetrate beauty and love and perfume! As I say, the flowers met there so soon, they scarcely knew they'd been parted, and when they met they just up and started right in to talk: and oh! the joy and gladness and love, which shone from their faces, and crept above them into the faces of those who mourned—'til bright looked the ones who had been foriorn.

"Aren't you glad?" asked the Red, Red Rose, "We were taken away? Now just suppose we'd been left to die in our home trees, we'd never have made folks happy, you see!" 'And aren't you glad?" asked dear Mignonette, "That over these graves again we've met, 'these graves of the soldiers who wore the blue—and also those who wore the gray—and isn't it true that God gave the flowers to cheer mankind? So leaving our homes we should not mind." "And flowers, dear," said a blue-eyed one, "I am glad to have helped the birds and the sun and all of nature to help cheer man and remember their loved ones; I'm glad I can bring to each mind some bright past spot—when I softly whisper 'Forget-menot!' Thus one and all of the tiny flowers gladdened all of those solemn hours, as folks who'd laid their dead away came to the graves to love and cheer—for each one kn
