THE SMELL OF WAR

The next minute, on my hands and knees, I was trying to force my bulk through one of the narrow openings; and, finally succeeding after floundering around in the mud, I found myself descending in the mud, I found myself ing around in the mud, I found myself descending into a place the first impression of which was taken by the nostrils. You breather a sickening damp heat, to be expected in a hole in the ground, the floor of which was spread with decomposing straw, and your stomach revolted to the tench of unwashed clothing remaining long on your lamp around the casee, you saw it was empty. The men were in the firing pits. Then the inquiring white finger of the torch pointed to a picture of the Kalser fastened lin some miraculous manner to the earthen wall, and under it you read, "Gott mit uns," and you knew that the men out there in the pits believed that God was with them, and you found yourself wondering if he was.—The Christian Herald.
