Head of Mine Workers' District Asks Rule to Prevent Certification of Foremen

whether or not the appeal of President James Matthews, of No. 9 district of the United Mine Workers of America from the Dauphin court's decision against him in asking for an injunction to restrain the State Department of Mines from certant foremen and assistant foremen, acts as a supersedeas, will be argued before the Dauphin county court at 2 o'clock Tuesday, June 22. Additional Law Judge S. J. M. McCarrell made an order to that effect this morning.

Counsel for the mine workers in appealing from the court's decision pointed out that the attorney general had notified James Broderick, chief of the bureau of mines, that the appeal did not act as a supersedeas and accordingly the chief of mines was preparing to issue the certificates. This the mineworkers' wish to prevent pending the court's decision as to whether the appeal supersedes.

Darius Brown flushed under the little tinge of color he thought he had detected in those pale eyes. For a moment the broker pondered though no trace of his thoughts showed on his face.

no trace of his thoughts snowed on his face.

"I'll think it over," he decided.

Brown opened his mouth, then closed it again as the pale eyes met his own. Heavily he turned away, his back stooped as though some great burden had just been placed there.

"I will be at the United Club until I hear from you," he said.

Joseph Drum stood on the bank steps, listening without a tremor to the treble of the newsboy across the street, the boy who had always before been able to cause him such terror. Yet now that he knew the worst he was cool and collected and coherent. All the hysteria that had been his in the days of petty pifering with the bank's cash was gone. He had not exactly become hardened, though it had gone on for a long time, but he knew now that there was nothing he could do to save himself; that Fate with all her devious twistings and turnings could not save him.

Yes, he could make out every word that speit his ruin. He even smiled as he refused to purchase a newspaper from the lad. What the boy cried aloud to the world was news enough to last him till the end of time—as he would measure time.

He reached back to feel the bulk of the automatic in his pocket. He had not forgotten. He had managed to make a thorough clean-up in his department, even finishing with the revolver that belonged to the institution. Well, it was but right that when he had finished with the bank, the bank should finish with him. He would attend to that most conscientiously.

In the morning the examiner would go over his cash books. Before this he had managed by clever thievery and avoiding any juggling with the books to slip back his piferings sufficiently to conceal the greater sum missing. But that final haul of $75,000 loomed too large for any overlooking.

A $75,000 loomed too large for any overlooking.

His step was light, his greeting normal to the clerk and elevator attendants as he went to his apartment. Nobody would ever have suspected him to be the repository of a single care. He cooly surveyed the cozy nest where he had been so happy and so miserable, the home out of which he had managed to make such a botch.

Carefully, methodically, solicitous not to disarray any of his wife's toilet articles, he placed the ugly automatic among the delecate pieces therefrom the drawer and began his note of explanation.

He halted. How silly and insincere that sounded! He cudgelled his trains for the proper words to convey the real meaning of such a parting. It did not occur to him that his toolness was that of torpor. He scratched the pen through his hair—an old habit—as though the action would induce thought. The tinkle of the phone in the living room brought a sharp exclamation of impatience from him as it insistently obtruded upon his mental effort. Reluctantly he picked it up, his voice cool and collected. A slight smile parted his lips as Field announced himself.

"Yes, I know," his lips moved.
"I have just closed your C. D. & E. with one hundred thousand dollars profit, Mr. Drum. Is that correct?"

He heaved a sigh of relief. His broker had sold instead of bought and he was safe.

Then, like a flash it came; came with the click of the key in the lock of the door; came with the scent of violets his wife affected. Through the portieres he could see her brother accompanied her. Their voices were lifted in angry controversy but he paid no attention to the words. A fresh panic had selzed him as a harrowing problem presented: HOW TO GET THE MONEY INTO THE VAULT BEFORE MORNING?

A panic was upon him, a paroxym of terror. His hands grasped the portieres and he would have flung himself into the living room when he halted abruptly, listening—listening—"I tell you, Flo, you've got to can it. He's a decent guy, this husband of yours, and I'm strong for him. I wouldn't say a word if I didn't know you were kidding yourself along. I tell you it's getting loosely talked about when a gambler like me hears it. I tell you it ani't possible for a bank teller to live the way Drum lives and support you the way you're supported and be on the up and up. He may have got by up to now—I ain't saying. But he can't get by long with this stuff. I tell you grand beat it to the bushes quick."
