STEAMER ENDEAVORS TO RAM SUBMARINE

Underwater Craft Pops Up 100 Yards Ahead of Cunarder Near Liverpool

Special to The Telegraph London, June 22.—The prompt action of Captain Kinnard, of the Cunarder Cameronia, which sailed from New York June 11 and docked yesterday at Liverpool, probably saved the ship from being torpedoed by a German submarine. Peter Fletcher, of New York, an intimate friend of Secretary of the Interior Lane, related the narrow escape of the Cameronia today when he called at the American embassy.

With his wife, Mr. Fletcher sailed on the Cameronia, feeling, as he told embassy attaches, that it was just as safe to travel on a liner flying the British flag as on an American ship in view of the prosecutive attacks by Germans on all shipping.

It was broad daylight Sunday morning at 7 o'clock and the Cameronia was steaming slowly into the mouth of the Mersey when Captain Kinnard saw a periscope pop out of the water 100 yards ahead.

Suddenly a submarine rose to the surface of the water. The Cameronia's captain dropped his binoculars and, steering his ship straight ahead, made for the submarine to try to ram it. The engine room responded to a call for full steam and the Cameronia fairly leaped ahead.

The captain made a bee line for the submarine. It looked as if the liner, says Fletcher, who was standing on the promenade deck, would ram the submarine fairly in the middle, but the submarine shot down into the water, diving beneath the steamship.

Three minutes later the submarine appeared on the opposite side of the ship, fifty yards away. The submarine again took a sight on the liner, but the Cameronia's captain now had his ship going on an entirely different track, having sharply swerved.

The submarine was out of range for a sure shot. It tried to catch up with the Cameronia, but Captain Kinnard's tactics had enabled him to escape in safety.

The submarine pursued for a mile, but was unable to gain on the Cameronia, and finally gave it up.

Alice: Your latest defiance of all feminine law has closed my home to you. I have placed one-half of your father's fortune to your credit. Your maid and trunk are at the Goldcrest Apartments. Mother.

III.

There was the hint of longing on Esther Halstead's face as Alice finished showing her through the dainty little Goldcrest apartment. Not the longing for freedom which seemed the principal reason for Alice's delight; not the pride of ownership the younger girl had displayed, but the thought of how perfectly it would serve as a setting for the life she had imagined with the man she loved, the picture of Felix Lynn's occupying special little nooks and corners of the apartment—that was what brought the tears all unconsciously to her eyes.

"And you will come to my reception—just a little house-warming tomorrow afternoon, Esther?"

She started to shake her head in dissent, smiling at the eagerness of the girl to begin making the most of her new-found liberty. But Alice prattled on before she had time to answer.

"First I'm going to ask Felix Lynn and—"

Esther's lips parted in a smile. She could not forego the delight of seeing him again. And in such intimate surroundings! True, she owed a great deal to her ailing father, but she owed a debt to this other man as well.

While Alice darted to the phone, intent upon carrying out her plan immediately it entered her head, Esther thought it over. Was she doing right or wrong? Torn between two impulses even without the right to consider her own desires she could make no decision without hurting father or husband. But it meant possibly the life of her father, and if Felix refused to wait the short time old John Halstead had to live, if he could not be unselfish then—She frowned unhappily as she thrust the thought away from her.

"Felix is typing on his yacht now," Alice poutingly announced as she re-entered the room.

Esther smiled lightly as she took her leave. Lacking irresponsibility herself, it was charmingly delightful to her in others. And it was so becoming to Alice, her naive delight in this freedom from restraint. She was still laughing as she left the house and came back to her own distressing responsibilities.

So engrossed in fact, she did not turn back and see Alice slipping lightly down the street in the opposite direction. Even her innocent mind would have suspected that the young girl was about to do something fearful, but it mildly, might have been termed indiscreet.

For Alice Knight's very back bristled with indignation as she saw a bit insolently upon pedestrians as though defying them. Now and then she would halt dubiously, biting her lips thoughtfully a little, but she quickly resume her journey.

It was the hour immediately before the curtain of night descends upon the twilight that Captain Judd looked up sharply at a hall from the dock.

While he waited at top of the landing stairs for the girl, he wondered mightily as Alice Knight, lightly climbed beside him. What in the name of common sense could this young woman want aboard the yacht at such an hour? And what should he do? Again then Captain Judd's exactly as most people do when puzzled. He pointed toward the rail where the owner stood dreamily staring out to sea.

Lynn was tired, very tired, and the rest he sought out here upon the equally troubled sea came not so readily as he had expected. The very soul of him chafed at John Halstead's bitter mandate that he was to be a stranger at his home. He had thought, out here, to get away from the torment of being in the same city with Esther and yet so remote from her. That the same sounds he heard might reach her ears, that the same sights he saw might be in her eyes at the same moment and that she was still thousands of miles apart from him for all the good it did—that was what tortured him beyond endurance.

Halstead's fading strength, the precariousness of his clutch upon life Esther's obedience to him were in Lynn's thoughts—he was forced to admit, when calmness soothed his harassed brain, that the qualities that kept Esther away were the self same qualities that caused him so to idolize her. And still he rebelled against the harsh dictum of fate; still he seethed at her; still he tortured himself with dubity regarding the love that would sacrifice so much for duty.

Alice Knight—A slight smile curved his lips as he recalled the beautiful, wild, young creature. Alice Knight—untamed, rebellious at conventions, heedless of the morrow, in love with life! Why could not Esther have some of the—

A little laugh, a bit timid despite its bravado, made him turn swiftly. It was as though a Merlin had waved his wand and materialized his thoughts. He could not quite conceal his pleasure at sight of Alice, looking at him a little defiantly, a little bashfully, as she stood just a few feet away. He could not quite cloak the insincerity of his reproaches, allowed them to be snuffed out completely as her fingers brushed lightly against his own as she passed, they leaned against the taffrail.
