Beauty of Sewing

Embroidery Used by the Earliest
Church on Robes and Altars
Most womanly of all arts is embroidery. And of all the fine arts embroidery is the most distinguished, possessed of the highest approbation and is of the most ancient prestige.
We find in the 35th chapter of Exedos, 35th verse that in directions for adornment of the temple embroidery was given an important place.
Them hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the ounning tworkman, and of the embroiderer, in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen and of the weaver." Thus read the ancient order for embroidery in the Temple.
In ecclesiastical embroidery the church always required the colors to portray the following meanings:
WHITE—Emblem of purity, innocence, faith, joy, light and life.
RED—Passion of Our Lord and the suffering and martyrdom of the saints.
BLUE—Emblematic of Heaven, piety, sincerity, godliness and divine contemplation.
YELLOW—Brightness and goodness of God, faith and fruitfulness.
GREEN—Used by the church on ordinary Sundays and week days and signifies bountifulness, hope, mirth, youth and prosperity.
VIOLET—Humanity, deep love and truth.
BLACK—Symbolical of death and end mourning.

GEORGE C. SCHEUDIL,

She leaped aside behind another fiailing hands smashed down upon it such a force it was torn from his grip. He seized another, that same insane series of cries rack-ing his throat, and leaped upon her, closer closer even as her shrieks of terror brought the crew on the run.

Captain Judd leaped at the madman, circling him with arms and legs, finding himself being tossed about by the man's maniacal strength like a pigmy. Others joined him and, under a tangle of legs and arms and bodies, Felix Lynn was borne to the

And Alica Knight, trembling like a runaway horse, stood close and watched, her eyes luminous now, her face twitching in sympathy at every sound of the madman—the man she had driven to this pass.

had driven to this pass.

"There's a private sanitarium on—"
She did not hear any more. She only knew that her whole heart was going out to the man they held so tightly, the man whose eyes blazed so flercely when they rested upon her, the man who redoubled his struggles so long as she was near.

Dr. Bradnar looked down at the struggling Felix Lynn. Old friends they had been and, somehow, the spectacle struck deep at something within him he had thought long since crusted over. crusted over.

He had listened carefully to the

He had listened carefully to the captain's report and dove-tailed the scene with the chance gossip he had heard. At times Lynn was quiet, at other times he would rave and tear in the grip of the attendants with the strength of ten men. And always in these struggles would he be pursued by the eyes and the lips that never opened."

Finally with a shrug, the doctor left the place, a rather foolish smile upon his face, a certain decision in his step that came from the indecision actuating a move that his associates might have constructed as partaking of the sentimental. He turned in at the Halstead residence, finding Esther there clad in deep mourning. He plunged squarely at the heart of the matter.

the matter.

"Miss Halstead," he began quickly, "I have come to you on behalf of your husband— He lifted his hand as she drew quickly away from him, her eyes hardening with decision.

nim, her eyes hardening with decision.

"Felix Lynn has suffered a complete mental breakdown. Not the break-down which demands a few weeks rest but the sort that may possibly be cured if the correct methods are applied immediately."

"You mean—he is—"

"Insane, Miss Halstead. Yes, that is what I mean. He is violently insane. I would not ask you to take any risk but—"

Her eyes flared deflantly, while her shoulders straightened.
"I am not afraid."

His eyebrows lifted in surprise as Esther suddenly left the room, to reappear almost immediately, her hat on for the street. Without a word she took his arm and moved out the house with him.

Felix was struggling in the grip of a powerful attendant when she entered the room. And then a great pity and love welled within her and lighted the eyes of her as she moved toward this man who had been her husband. He looked up at her as her hand fell upon his shoulder. Dr. Breadner watched the scene eagerly, a slow smile playing about the corners of his mouth, as Lynn ceased to struggle looked up into the tender eyes fastened upon him, then sank back quietly in his chair.

He was about to tiptoe out the room, away from the scene when sounds of a struggle in the corridor reached his ears. He moved swiftly loward the door, annoyed at the distraction, then was brushed aside by a woman who darted into the room, away from the attendant, stood a moment in the doorway, then flung herself upon her knees at he right ide of the patient, flinging her arms about him and bursting into a wild paroxysm of regret and love.

She lifted her eyes, conscious of intoher's presence. Eather did not linch as she met those eyes, did not rield by an inch her possession of his man she loved.

Dr. Breadner stepped forward, ait stunned at the situation. The latte of two women for the right to shrink fearfully away from him and made Esther cling the tighter to the hand she held.

Then, at the savage, bestial guttered of rage that came from his throat, doctor and attendant leaped forward, restraining him or live decoys, in the Sacramento Valley in California. The live decoys are wild geese that at one time were wounded and having had a portion of one of the wings removed, are unable to fly.

These decoys are very hungry when taken to the field and are placed in wire enclosures close to the pits in which the hunters conceal themselves. The wild birds flying overhead hear the feeding call of the hungry decoys and see the live birds on the ground and lose their suspicion and come down within range of the guns. They are met with a hall of shot and often 40 or 50 birds are killed out of one large bunch as they fly in over the decoys.

Such slaughter as this is rapidly decreasing the number of geese that yearly migrate from the North to California, and if continued will event.
