New sixteen-inch coast guns are now being constructed at the United States government arsenal at Watervliet, N. Y., for the new fortress at Cape Henry, Va., and for the new Los Angeles fortifications. These guns will weigh 127 tons each. They will fire projectiles weighing 2,400 pounds, which will have a muzzle velocity of 2,150 feet per second and be capable of piercing 46.4 inches of armor plate at the muzzle. At an elevation of 45 degrees these new guns will shoot over 50 miles. Such a range would not be effective, however, and would never be attempted either in practice or in actual warfare. All of our coast guns are set in their carriages to fire at an angle of 15 degrees. The greater elevations are used only for mortars.

tars. At the present time the only 16-inch guns the United States has are stationed at Sandy Hook. Except fo, these defenses of New York Harbor, according to General W. W. Wotherspoon, chief of staff of the United States army, a modern battleship carrying 15-inch guns could stand off a mile and a half beyond the range of any American fortification and batter it to pieces. It was this impressive fact that caused our war department to decide on 16-inch guns as the future armament of our fortifications.
