chudder and an appalling fear was in her eyes. In the doorway stood Mrs. Fall. FATE was now taking a hand, and the certain desting started on its way by an evil-tongued man, and a sus-picious-minded woman, was hurrying the pawns to a swift destruction. Mrs. Norris went to her mother, who calmed her fears and sent her to her home again, after a good night's sleep. Mrs. Fall applied for a divorce and then went to the seashore and sought her cottage on the beach-the same beach on which the Norris cottage stood.

Says it reddens her complexion, or something like that, and prefers to live inland further. She never comes down." "MMMMMMmmmmm." Mrs. Fail said no more then to her companion, but as she rose and started to move leisurely off, Mrs. Hunter's finely at-tuned ears received an impression of sound, that, after diligent assembling and re-assembling in her busy mind, she was gratified to resolve into some-thing that sounded very promisingly like "Birds of a feather." Mrs. Hunter was on the scent. Not like "Birds of a feather." Mrs. Hunter was on the scent. Not obviously on the scent. Oh, dear, no. That would never do-but eagerly on the scent-keenly on the scent-urg-ently on the scent, her bright expectant eyes and patronizing, preoccupied smile signifying unquestionably to those who knew her that the trail was warm, the quarry faint, and ere night-fall she. Mrs. Norris saw her husband's office was empty. What could it mean? She made bolder, stepped to the center of the aperture, and bent far out to peer into the office opposite. The sheer depth of the long shaft fascinated her and gave her a light hollow feeling of nausea. She drew in her head with a sharp jerk, and staggered back, her giddiness overcoming her. She would have fall-.n but for a strong arm around her waist. It was Willard Fall. She turned her head toward him, half smiling, half apologetic, to thank him for his timely aid. But the words froze on her lips, her heart contracted, her entire body was convulsed with a shudder and an appalling fear was in her eyes. HOTEL MAJESTIC Virginia av. and Paach. "Nice place the Norrises have, don't you think?" "Quite nice." Mrs. Fall didn't care at that moment to think of the Nor-risses. "By the way, did you pass there on your way down?" There was that in her voice that bespoke something more than her words could be literally held to account for. Mrs. Fall perked up. "No, I came down by train-why?" "Oh, nothing. Only I thought you might know who that young woman is he brought down in his machine this afternoon-slim, brown eyed, black hair." "Alone?"-eagerly. "No"-with a combined hand wave and shoulder shrug, as though that didn't alter it any, "she was with what looked like a delightfully useless chaperone-some superannuated in-competent." Mrs. Hunter, like Mrs. Fall, was one of the Old Guard of Society, and the range of her "observation" was astonishing. Other people's affairs were as the breath of life to her, and took it, in effect, as a personal affront if Society did not constantly furnish her keen scent with a fresh track. young friend along." "Pardon me?" "I say we have some perfectly charming times—and you can bring your young friend along." "My young friend ?"—in a tone of bewilderment. "Yes, the girl at your cottage, you know. Came down with your husband yesterday—lovely young thing!—the girl, of course. Such eyes, and such lovely black hair." "Yes, yes, to be sure"—quickly, and trying to cover the very evident fact that she knew nothing at all about it. "I will, shortly. So good of you to ask."

"T will, shortly. So good of you to sk." "T'm afraid I must be going now-ch, Heavens!" (looking at her watch), "Mra. Ormsby will never forgive mei Good-bye, dear." "Good-bye, Mrs. Hunter; sorry you can't stay." Ethel sat there, mute and wondering, trying, struggling to grasp the mean-ing of it all, and vaguely dreading as she struggled to arrive at an explana-tion all to plausible that would sus-tain and re-inforce her horrible sus-picions of yesterday. She had felt, yesterday, that if only the awfut mis-conception linking her name odlously with Mr. Fail's could be dispelled, she could master the doubt that pervaded her of her husband's relations with Myra Foster.
