

WOMEN AND THEIR INTERESTS

"Their Married Life"

Copyright by International News Service.

"Here comes Warren now," announced Helen. "I am so anxious for you to meet him."

The woman who was seated in the big tapestry chair smiled at Helen's enthusiasm.

"I'm sure I'll be very glad to know him," she said in a low, attractive voice. "Doesn't it seem strange, Helen, that all these years have passed and you have a husband and a little daughter?"

Helen smiled reminiscently and Warren came into the room the next moment, newly shaved and with a virtuous looking. Helen felt justifiably proud and showed it in the introduction she made.

"Warren, dear, this is an old school friend of mine, from St. Louis. She is doing newspaper work in New York. Miss Knowles, my husband."

Warren acknowledged the introduction with a hearty greeting.

"When did you come to New York," he asked courteously.

"I have been in New York for some time, but I had no idea Helen was here. We lost track of each other long ago."

"Do you enjoy newspaper work?"

"Yes, very much indeed; it is certainly a fascinating game. I want Helen to come to see me at my studio where I write. I hope you will come, too."

at this her friend's first glimpse of her home life.

Helen was not without a touch of pride in her accomplishments in the holding together of the home. After all there was no doubt about the fact that home building was just as vitally important these days as was any kind of a trade.

"Nora, we'll have the strawberry shortcake, and this grape fruit salad, and theiced bouillon first. I guess that's all, and have dinner promptly at six-thirty."

Helen slipped out of her apron and returned to the living room to find Frances and her husband deep in a discussion as to whether a college education was necessary to the successful businessman of the present. Warren did not look up as she entered; neither did Frances offer to include her in the conversation, so Helen had a good chance to study her friend and her husband at close range.

Frances was very sweet as she talked vivaciously. Her cheeks were pink and she made little movements with her hands for emphasis. Warren was arguing easily, with the slightly satirical expression on his face that was always present when he was sure of his ground.

Nora announced dinner and Frances turned to Helen eagerly, anxious to have her cause championed and from then on the conversation was general. Frances praised the dinner and all the dainty little appointments that Helen was so particular about. When it came time for her to leave, Warren suggested that they take her home, but she refused to allow such a thing.

"Why, I run all over the city alone and think nothing of it," she protested laughingly. And after extracting a promise from Helen to look her up soon, she finally departed.

"Nora, dear, what do you think of her?" said Helen as they went back into the living room.

"I don't know," returned Warren, irritably. "She is a pretty woman and evidently has her own mind."

"Don't you like her?"

"I don't know as she is so all fired attractive."

"That's funny. I thought you were awfully interested."

"Just because I argued with her."

"Well, she's all right, but I can't say much for women of that type."

"She's out doing things. A woman ought to get married, that's her business. I'm for the old-fashioned woman every time."

(Another instalment of the interesting series will appear here soon.)

Helen left the room with an excuse to see about dinner. Frances Knowles had been a great friend of hers when they were girls, and she wondered curiously into what kind of a woman she had developed. Frances had always possessed a certain attraction, although she had never been particularly beautiful. But her auburn hair and fair skin, and above all her dazzling smile and a certain way, willful and fascinating, had always attracted her with a man. And now she was a newspaper woman, fighting her way in the world. Frances had always had a ready wit and a desire to be independent. Helen had always supposed that woman who were workers had a certain amount of grind attached to their personalities, but in this case it was certainly different.

Frances looked the well-groomed woman in every sense of the word. Her gray linen suit and her white hat were daintily feminine—she did not talk with any advanced ideas of feminism and the like, and yet there was a subtle difference, the difference between a woman who is married and the woman who is working out the problem of life for herself.

Helen wondered if she envied Frances as she busied herself with the little homely tasks that constituted the preparation of a meal. She wanted everything particularly nice

A PRACTICAL COMBINATION

An Under Garment that is at Once Dainty and Serviceable.

By MAY MANTON

8635 Empire Combination with Envelope Drawers, Small 34 or 36, Medium 38 or 40, Large 42 or 44 bust.

Empire gowns will of course bring a demand for Empire underwear. Here is a combination garment that shows that finish and which is especially desirable at this season since it means chemise or corset cover and drawers in one and so reduces the number of garments needed for comfort. The drawers are in envelope style, the garment is drawn on over the head and ribbon threaded through beading holds it in place. It is a pretty model for the lingerie cottons and also for the crepe de chine that is being so extensively used and for the light weight taffeta that also is in demand. Trimmings of lace and of embroidery are equally correct although as a matter of course, needlework always gives a sense of daintiness and care not to be found in any other treatment. The garment is a very simple one, very easy to make. If the envelope drawers are not liked, it can be cut off to form a chemise.

For the medium size will be needed 2 1/2 yds. of material 36 or 44 in. wide, with 1/4 yd. of insertion, 6 yds. of edging and 3/4 yd. of beading to trim as illustrated.

The pattern 8635 is cut in three sizes: small 34 or 36, medium 38 or 40, large 42 or 44 bust. It will be mailed to any address by the Fashion Department of this paper, on receipt of ten cents.

TO TALK ON U. S. NAVY AND DEFENSES

Colonel Graves of the New York American to Address Commerce Chamber

"The Navy and Our National Defenses" will be the timely subject of an address to be delivered at a noon-day meeting of the membership of the Chamber of Commerce during the latter part of this month by John Temple Graves, managing editor-in-chief of the New York American.

Colonel Graves has given this subject a great deal of careful study. He was born in Georgia and for years was a prominent newspaper editor in Atlanta before going to New York city. He is recognized as an orator and leader of the progressive and patriotic sentiment in the South and other sections.

The exact date of the meeting at which Colonel Graves will deliver his address will be announced later. The Chamber will very likely have another membership meeting on national defense this summer which will be addressed by an international authority on the question whose final acceptance will not be received for a few days.

Uncle Sam Takes Notice

The bureau has requested that a supply of the last issue of the Harrisburg Chamber's bulletin be sent to it for distribution at its branch offices in Boston, New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, Seattle, Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis and Pittsburgh, and to

Traction Officials in Chicago Coming High

Chicago, July 7.—Salaries paid to high officials of Chicago's surface car lines were revealed to-day before the Railway Arbitration Board by Leonard A. Busby, president of the lines. The revelation came on the cross-examination of the head of the traction system by Attorney Samuel Alschuler, one of the counsel for the employees. Under the schedule reported by Busby the three highest paid officials were: Leonard A. Busby, president, $60,000.

Henry A. Blair, chairman of the board of operation, $30,000.

John M. Roach, "in an advisory capacity," $20,000.

One of the charges of the employees made at the time of the strike was that of excessive salaries paid to high officials of the company.
