WHO PAYS?

Today and Tomorrow

By EDWIN BLISS

The original idea of mutiny against the food had now grown into hatred for those above them. For just a second Payne hesitated. The arms of Grady still swung like flails now and then a heavy body crashing to the floor under the force of those pile-driver blows. Then the fists were pinned and waved uselessly in the air. Came another lung and he knew the foreman had been taken off his feet. His hand kissed the cold butt of the revolver at his waist. He did not know how it happened, but he knew in his hand, was unconscious of the muscular action that pulled the trigger. He only saw the orange spurt of flame that leaped from the muzzle of the squirming mass, heard the splatter of splinters from the roof, then the weapon dangled uselessly in his hand. A cold silence fell instantly upon the pandemonium. He was conscious of a long, sighing shudder and knew seconds would tell whether the victory was won. Brown Joe staggered to his feet, pushing the food from his eyes and staring about him glassily, still dazed from the blow that had felled him. Payne waved the revolver threatening and the men quailed away from him, the expression of cowed beasts in their eyes, then as the gun steadied in his hand, dived fearfully out of the place.

Grady gripped the ring-leader by the arm as he would have sneaked out, throwing him heavily before the young superintendent.

"You're fired," Payne snapped. "Get out and don't wait for your time, either. If I catch you about the fields again I'll not shoot at the rafters. Get me!"

The fellow slunk backwards toward the door, darting fearful glances at the foreman, who watched him threateningly, his fists swaying slightly as though nothing but the delight of his more than another opportunity of testing them upon the ugly visage. But, as he slumped out the door there was a look in his eyes, about the corners of his mouth, the murderously low forehead that seemed to indicate he had not so thoroughly understood as the young superintendent wished.

Payne started to look about him at the wreckage, when a heavy step from the doorway made him turn abruptly, to see his employer entering the room. Framed in the doorway stood, staring about him with knitted brows. Behind the man had gathered about his touring car, the sound of their threatening murmurs a low buzz—the buzz of mob just barely held in check.

"Well?" he snapped.

"Mutiny against the food," Payne explained. "I phoned you yesterday again for orders as to what was to be done. The men really can't be blamed, Mr. Monroe. They haven't had stuff fit for a dog to eat."

"Humph!"

The old man picked up a remnant of crockery upon the floor upon which some of the food still clung. He regarded it disgustingly, then suddenly allowed it to drop quickly from his hand as a sniff of it caught his nostrils.

"Phew! Can't blame anybody kicking at such stuff," he muttered, then a frown of annoyance grew into heavy anger upon his countenance.

"You've written me three times about this situation, haven't you?" he demanded, abruptly; then, without waiting for an answer, as Payne flushed and started to stammer: "I don't want to hear anything about that. It's my own fault; trust Julia to ever do anything. Every morning the same thing; every night—wait till tomorrow. The food is absolutely to have no sense of responsibility, of the rights of others, anything save her own right to put off—put off—put off."

Payne hung his head, avoiding the glowering eye of the old man. There was no denying what had just been said. Somehow, he had felt from the beginning that the psychological firmness was in some measure responsible for the neglect that had led up to this scene of havoc. Yet everything within him rose up to her defense. Before he had time to formulate a defense, Ira Monroe whirled upon his heel and stepped out into the center of the angry group.

It was characteristic of the man that the moment he saw a situation and grasped its full significance he took hold of it and battled for the mastery. Payne stepped quickly up beside him, fearful of the result of such an attempt while the men were in their present humor. Monroe brushed him aside, lifting his hand.

"I understand that you've been some complaint about the food," he began, a twinkle in his eye that melted some of the threatening glances fastened upon him. "I've understood it was bad for some time, but I didn't realize how bad food could be until I took a—"

"He wrinkled his face wryly and the ice was broken.

"From the back of the crowd a man laughed. In a second he was joined by others and soon Monroe held them in the palm of his hand.

"Well, it's going to get better and get better right away," he declared, emphatically. "I'll go you one better than that, men, and tell you its going to get good. Tonight you can look forward to a real supper—a real supper, understand."

"What on earth is the matter, Nora?" said Helen, as she was met at the door. Nora had a most agonized expression on her face and had been crying. "What is it?" insisted Helen, shaking the girl in her excitement.

"Mrs. Curtis," began Nora, "I don't want anything about Winifred, is it?"

"Yes, ma'am, she is gone."

"Gone?" almost screamed Helen. "What do you mean? For heaven's sake, Nora, stop crying and tell me what it is!"

"I haven't seen her since she was gone."

"Yes, ma'am," she began. "It was about half an hour ago, ma'am, and I was doing my work. I thought Winifred was playing around in the front room, but when I went to look for her she was gone."

Helen was looking around wildly. "Helen don't mean that she has gone outside."

"Yes," said Nora. "The door was open. I don't see how it happened, but it must have been left open somehow."

"She turned and ran out into the hall. The hall on that floor was empty—of course it would be if Winifred had been missing half an hour. She ran impetuously for the elevator and questioned the boy as soon as he came up."

"No," he said, frightened at her manner. "I haven't seen no little girl."

Helen was at her wits' end. What should she do? There was not a soul in the street. What if Winifred had wandered off and should be picked up by some unscrupulous people? It wasn't likely she would be seen these days. Ought she to telephone Warren? Perhaps the police ought to be notified.

The elevator boy, now as frightened as she was, whirled upstairs again.

"Nora, I am going to telephone Mr. Curtis," she said, "and tell him what happened. I know, ma'am," began Nora, "once a woman lost her little girl in the street and she found her the next day, and she had been run over, ma'am, Lizzie."

"Keep still, Nora," said Helen, her hands over her ears. Suppose something of the kind happened to Winifred? Her little baby, in her white socks and with her tawny little top bobbing up and down as she shook her head. Oh, she couldn't bear it, she couldn't, she would have to telephone Warren.

"The elevator boy she tried to calm herself, but when she got the office Mr. Curtis had just gone to lunch.

"I haven't seen no little girl," she said, speaking hoarsely.

Edison Will Be Head of New Advisory Board

Special to The Telegraph
West Orange, N. J., July 13.—Thomas A. Edison has accepted an invitation from Secretary Daniels to head an advisory board of civilian inventors for a bureau of invention and development to be created in the Navy Department. His acceptance will go at once to Washington, where the new plans await word from the man "who can turn dreams into realities."

Mr. Daniels' idea of utilizing the inventive genius of Americans in and out of the military and naval service to meet conditions of warfare shown in the conflict in Europe is outlined in a letter written by him Wednesday asking Mr. Edison whether, as a patriotic service to his country, he would undertake the task of advising the proposed board.

Among the great problems to be laid before the investigators, the Secretary mentioned submarine warfare, adding that he felt sure that with Mr. Edison's help the officers of the navy would be able to meet this new danger with new devices that will assure peace to our country by their effectiveness.

A SMART SUIT IN MIDDY EFFECT

A New Model that can be Made With or Without the Applied Yoke.

By MAY MANTON

8631 Boy's Suit, 6 to 10 years.

Mothers of small boys are ever on the lookout for something new in the way of suits. Here is one that suggests the Midway idea and also has certain Norfolk features and it is thoroughly becoming and absolutely smart. The trousers are straight, as are most of those of the season, and the little blouse is belted in the becoming manner and can be finished with the true Midway yoke or made without it with equal success. In either case, there is an opening at the front, so that the blouse is drawn on over the head and the edges of this opening are laced together. In the picture, white and blue linen are combined effectively, but the suit can be made of one material and one color throughout or made of contrasting ones as liked. All white with collar, cuffs and belt of a color would be pretty, or a suit of a colored material would perhaps be more practical with the collar and cuffs of white. Linen, galatea, cotton poplin and other washable materials are the preferred ones for suits of this sort and this season colors are exceptionally varied and exceptionally beautiful.

Little Yellow Car to Satisfy State's Demand

Special to The Telegraph
Philadelphia, July 13.—Guided by an intrepid constable, with a huge banner bearing the legend, "Votes for Women," flapping gaily in the breeze, Dr. Anna Shaw's "Little Yellow Car" yesterday rolled away from the garage of the suffragist's home at Moylan.

It whizzed up State street, Media's principal thoroughfare, and was to languish in durance vile until tomorrow, when it will be offered for sale to satisfy the State's claim for taxes amounting to $126, which Dr. Shaw has refused to pay.
