THE WIRE AT WORK

THE WIRE AT WORK

The voice of the wire is constant as, light. It rivals the speed of light waves. On the last day of the year 1910 the airmen were in the sky above an aviation field at Los Angeles. Because then the interest of people in exhibition flights was still keen, a news association had its 'loop' from a direct wire circuit established at the press bench of the grandstand; a correspondent sat at the telegrapher's side and through his efficient finger dictated the turn of events straight to the San Francisco office of his association. There, an operator, receiving, sat at the showlider of another who tapped the key of the direct New York circuit, Events at Dominguez Field progressed without incident. The reporter in the press stand, his eyes aloft, droned a dull tale of "aerial derbies" and passenger-carrying flights into the ear of the operator. An announcer megaphoned "a startling exhibition flight by the world's most daring aviator," and a yellow biplane leaped from the turf to cut a straight, upward slash in the bure field of space. Un and un the sweep, balance on the brink of an air precipice, then—

"Flash! Hoxsey falling!" the reporter shouted. "Flash! Hoxsey falling!" an operator three hundred miles away in San Francisco flung over his shoulder to the fellow-operator at his elbow. "Flash! Hoxsey falling!" cried a man at the Frisco key in a big room four floors above New York's Broadway.

four floors above New York's Broadway.

Here was a prodigy. Before the biplane and the doomed airman had plunged a thousand feet to destruction men in the New York office of the news association knew that Hoxsey was falling from the sky—knew everything the hushed spectators three thousand miles away could know. The wire brought the message in less than thirty seconds. While men raced across Dominguez Field to the yellow jumble dropped from above—before ever a hand was laid on the wreck of the biplane—twenty wires out of San Francisco, Chicago and New York were humming this message to a score of cities: "Bulletin—Hoxsey fell 1,000 feet, Dominguez Field, Los Angeles, Probably dead."—Robert Welles Ritchie in Harper's Magazine for July.
