Tra Monroe settled back in his office chair, idly staring at the hands of the big clock. He had gone over the books for the first time in a week, had listened to Pat Grady's story of the fracas that had come so near end-ing fatally. And, as the old man's eyes closed, slowly, very slowly his mind traveled from the fields to his home in Los Angeles. A faint smile hovered about his lips as he thought of his petted daughter,

A faint smile hovered about his lips as he thought of his petied daughter, of the fearful consequences that might have occurred from her remissness in writing concerning the food supply out here. It seemed incredible that such a slight, fragile little thing could be the storm center about which such things revolved. And yet he was dubious whether even when he told of the affair, when he described the dan-ger her sweetheart had been in on account of it, when he pointed out to her the place in the roof where the built had lodged—he doubted whether even such a tale would be sufficient to cure her of the incorrigible habit she had of procrastination.

be prepared. He hustled toward the mess shack. Something must be done but for the life of him he could not imagine what it would be. Supper was what they intended having. He had sent his superintendent, the man he trusted sufficiently not only to put his busi-ness of his daughter. And his super-intendent had failed him. He joined Pat Grady in the mess hall. Silently the two men looked about them. Tables, chairs, crockery, food remained as it had been after the mutiny at the dinner table. Even the stench of the mess still hovered over the hall. He threw out his hands in a wide gesture of rage and helplessness. "Hell t' pay and then some," mut-tered the foreman.

tered the foreman. Monroe started a nod but checked it, throwing up his head like a runaway horse as the shrill scream of the whis-tle pierced his ears. Loud, shrieking, fiendish was the sound. He did not know what it might mean. There was no way of tel-ling that. Of consequences he cared little compared to the broken promise to his men. Already they were rushing toward this very place. And he had promised that they were ditled to, in-stead of which—this mess. Before he had time to even talk the situation over, to reach any conclu-stead of which—this mess. Before he had time to even talk the situation over, to reach any conclu-sion, a burly form hurtled in the door-way, followed by another, another, and then another. Monroe met the star-tled, incredulous eyes of the workmen. Then he lowered his own. "Well, I'm damm—" He lifted his head quickly at the threat in the sngry voice. If the men were in this mood already, then, under full headway, there was no telling to what extent their rage would take them. He lifted his hand, his power-ful shoulders lunged forward. ""Men, I'm soury," he said, simply, "You know I sent the superintendent to town to remedy this condition. I'm going to the phone now and see what can be done." The growi that went up showed that his declaration had far from mollified. He flushed darkiy, his iron jaw creep-ing out.

He flushed darkly, his iron jaw creep-ing out. "Tit's the first time I've ever had to pologize to you men," he snapped. "I'm going to do 'my best for you now. I said I'm sorry and I'll phone the city immediately. Now, you can take it or get your time. That's all." Without a side glance he shouldered his way through and stamped angrily into the office, snatching the receiver from the hook. Swiftly he clicked, his powerful finger gripping and un-gripping over the little bit of iron that spelt so much to him. A step sounded from the door. He turned to meet the eyes of his foreman, then shrugged his shoulders.
