"Their Married Life"

Helen hurried along the street, her umbrella dripping and her dress held high. She had neglected to go to see Mrs. Thurston until the day before she and Warren were to leave on their little trip.

Mrs. Thurston drew back and then leaned forward eagerly. "My old veil pin; well, did you ever. I never expected to see it again."

"No elevator, ma'am," said the grinning bell boy. So Helen prepared to ascend the stone steps. Then she reflected that she did not know which floor Mrs. Thurston lived on.

Helen herself would have gone without a diamond rather than make any one uncomfortable about it. Nevertheless, the thing was over and perhaps Mrs. Thurston was more prone to reason in these days.

"Fifth," he remarked laconically. And Helen groaned as she contemplated climbing all those stairs. Well, it had to be done, there was no need of lamenting the fact, and she went slowly up, passing closed doors on each floor and taking breath as she met the next flight.

Instead of the handsome lace negligees that Mrs. Thurston used to loiter around in, she was in a perfectly plain dark blue dress. Her beautiful gray hair was still as handsomely dressed, but there was an air about her that made Helen want to say impulsively, "What a brick you are."

Arrived at the top floor, she drew out a little vanity case and scrutinized herself in the tiny mirror. There was no need of going in looking like a freak, and the long climb had made her very warm. She powdered her face critically, stood a moment to let the cool air from a slightly open window blow in on her, and then she pressed the little button and waited, her heart in her mouth, and hoping frantically that Mrs. Thurston would not be in.

"How do you like it up here?" she said instead. Mrs. Thurston laughed a little bit. "Oh, we manage to exist," she said. "We live on the top floor in an apartment without an elevator so as to live in a decent neighborhood. I don't think I could bear coming down to the other."

There was an instant movement within, however, and a second later the door was opened and Mrs. Thurston stood before her.

"Yes, it's all right, unless you have to, then it's different." Helen looked around the little room and thought it charming. But then Mrs. Thurston had all the old furniture from her other apartment, and everything was arranged in good taste. Helen could see that Mrs. Thurston would make the best of any surroundings.

"Mrs. Curtis," said Helen, taking a long breath and holding out her hand. "Mrs. Curtis? Well whatever brings you up here?" queried Mrs. Thurston in her old breezy manner. Helen was relieved. At least the interview had opened promisingly.

"But not before I make you a cup of tea." "I'm afraid so. I am going away tomorrow, and there are hundreds of little things to do."

"You'll never guess," she said, laughing lightly and following her hostess into the narrow hall. Mrs. Thurston closed the door and motioned for Helen to walk into the front. The apartment was arranged with the regulation long drawn out hall, with different rooms opening from it, and the living room at the extreme end.

"Come and see me again," said Mrs. Thurston as they stood at the door. "Not until you call on me," said Helen playfully, "and please come soon, I want you to tell me what you think of Winifred."

"Thank you, I will," said the other woman simply, and somehow Helen felt the tears burn her eyelids. It must have been a great effort for a woman of Mrs. Thurston's temperament to act so generously as she had under the conditions. She must do her part to make her feel happier, perhaps Warren would be willing to have them down for bridge some evening. Well, she would see.

"And now that I'm forgiven," she said, rising, "I must run along." "But not before I make you a cup of tea."
