WHOO PAYS?

And while Mason was at the home of his sweetheart, telling her the good news, and asking her to be his wife, the other two—Gibson and Bell, were planning a different ending for that night; a meeting at which the Spanish dancer, the gambling house manager, the smug hypocritical owner, and the recent District Attorney were to plot the details of a vile plot to discredit the young assistant in the eyes of the world. And now we shall see how the plot worked out.

VI.
The next night Ellis and Marion took a long ride in his motor car. They returned late, and he lingered a few fond minutes before leaving her at her stoop. He came back toward his car, whistling softly, happily to himself, his hands stuck deep in his trousers pockets, his mind lost in the reverie his whistling belied.

A short sharp cry, as if of some one

Clarice, Overcome by Remorse, Attacks Dodge.

An urgent distress brought him back to a consciousness of outward things, as though about to fall and was again caught and sustained by Mason.

He rushed up and caught her quickly, half carrying her back to the stoop from which he had come. The woman had a deep blush on her face, but she was otherwise dressed in unrelieved black, so the veil was not provocative of any thought on his part.

"If you will come into this house, Miss Bell, I will be glad to see you." "Oh, I'm all right, thank you," she said weakly. "Just a weak spell. I get them often. I won't trouble you further. You're very kind. I will go home." She started to walk away from him, but again staggered weakly as though about to fall and was again caught and sustained by Mason.

He helped her into his automobile and started for her apartment on the upper West Side. She seemed to grow worse as they went along, and when they arrived her seeming plight made it necessary that he carry her up the stairs.

When they arrived at her room after a painful climbing of steps she suddenly recovered sufficiently to rise and take of her hat and veil, and he was shocked and incredulous at recognizing Clarice Adair, dancing girl of the cafe he had raided two night before. Her recovery was now extraordinarily rapid, and he was suddenly panic-stricken as a realization of what this all meant came upon him. She smiled at him mockingly as she began to take off her outer garments. He had not long to realize, however, for in another moment the door was thrown rudely open, and two men entered.

"You will come with us," one of them said, shortly. "But, I—"

"We cannot listen to explanations. Besides," looking meaningfully at the half-dressed woman in the corner, "I'm afraid you'd have rather a job of it."

The plot of Gibson and his tools had worked.

VII.
Came the day of trial; the trial of the young assistant district attorney, accused of contributing to the delinquency of a dancing girl. Clarice was the complainant; District Attorney Bell the prosecutor; Sid Dodge, the jury fixer, and Mason, the defendant. What if he did have a good attorney? What if he did get a jury disinterested? His reputation was blackened forever.

Into the surge of his despair came the thought of Marion. It was the one bright spot in the darkness of his broken life. The thoughts of her were the one solace that his traducers couldn't tear from him. And he turned his footsteps in the direction of her home. When he arrived there the butler barred his entrance, and the iron entered deeper into his soul.

"Marion," he cried out wildly, "Marion, oh Marion, you don't believe them!"

But the echoes of his mad, despairing cry were the only answer he received.

VIII.
Sid Dodge wrestled madly, fearfully with the woman before him, in the rear room of his cafe. She broke loose once, and with a fierce, wild gesture, took up a great vase and brought it down with terrific force on his shoulder, just missing his head.

Slowly she moved toward that face a horrible agony of powerless despair. Once her hands raised and tried to cover her face, and her shoulders hunched as she shrank deep into the chair as though trying to separate herself from the dread of her thoughts, but that was of no use. They would be with her always, those thoughts—always! What usurers, those thoughts—how they compounded the debt and made a settlement impossible! How she would have to pay—to pay ahead! Thoughts of the man she had ruined, the girl whose dream of love she had blighted, thoughts of the putrid vileness of her own lying soul! And now the light, and the realization that she would have evermore to pay!

That evening Charles Gibson spoke long and earnestly at a meeting of the Commonwealth Club, on the necessity for sincerity in all of life's undertakings.
