The Mental Pains of Little Ones as Intilicted by Careless Elders.

By Virginia Terhune Van de Water.

Copywright, 1915, by Star Company.
Children have a right to the carefree existence proper to their age.

Parents who think that they recognize this fact feel that in granting to young creatures such toys, comrades and amusements as childhood craves they are discharging their duties along this line.

Children are supposed to be, as a class, heedless little creatures. But they differ in temperament as much as do their elders. Some small boys and girls have a capacity of suffering that would appail of parents were its existence recognized. And one of the strangest things about children is their reciceristic than the trustful youngster would go to the mother with every imaginary or real worry. On the contrary, children keep most of their most poignant distress to themselves. They may complain of physical discomfort or pain, but of their spiritual and mental sufferings they say nothing.

One child told a lie and underwent torments of conscience for weeks, remembering that lie. He had told the would be prevented him they are the most of their most polyana the would in the would just about kill me. He had told the word had stuck to him would just about kill me. He was only seven and took her statement literally. In the daytime he could quiet his conscience with the assurance that everybody once in a while told a fib. But at night, alone in the dark, he would brood over that LIE, and each letter of the fearful word was a great black capital.

The knowledge that his agony, Again and again to be not her room and so her would recur to him and he would creep miserably back into bed. His mother was not strong. Suppose his confession were really to kill her. Does it all sound ridiculous and senseless, oh, wise and sane grown-who has forgotten the imaginations of childhood scoff at it. Not until this grown had he de murderer:

Does it all sound ridiculous and senseless, oh, wise and sane grown-who has forgotten the imaginatio world.

It was all in fun. But the child believed it. Little did the father suspect how anxiously she listened with dread unspeakable for news of the ship which would take her parents from her and banish her to a boarding school.

May Revive Railroad

The Delaware Susquehanna and Schuylkill tapped Drifton, Freeland, Gowen, Onelda, Derringer, Eckley and other coal operations and towns. The heavy traffic from the Schuylkill coal mines to the yards at Coxton, where trains are made up for the Lake trade, will be diverted over the D. S. & S. by the Lehigh Valley, which will spend $50,000, it is reported, to avoid taking the trips through Hazleton.
