DIARIES OF DEAD MEN GIVE INSIDE OF WAR

Life in Trenches Pictured as One Long Round of Fatigue and Squading

TURKS KILL MANY BRITISH

Sole Survivor of Co. Tells of How He Caused German Sniper to Suffer

Gallipoli Peninsula, Turkey, June 19 (correspondence of the Associated Press).—Many dead British soldiers have been buried by the Turks—usually after a trench has been taken. Before the body is disposed of it is searched for letters of some other means of identification. In the course of this many interesting documents, among them diaries of fallen officers and men, have been found. A number of these were placed at the disposal of the Associated Press correspondent with permission to copy such parts as he might care to make use of.

A dozen of the diaries were read. Parts of them are given here. Life in the trenches is pictured as one long round of "fatigue and squading" and keeping back the Turks, whom nearly all had come to respect and fear.

The diary of private R. Charlesworth, fifth platoon, B Company, Eighth Manchester Regiment, 32 years old, is somewhat typical of those kept by men of his station. There is a certain charm in his simple description of the trip to Egypt and the installing of the regiment in Mustapha Pacha camp, Alexandria. The insects there were a plague, his diary says, and the men were glad when they were transferred to Polymedia camp, on the Island of Cyprus.

Long Marches. Then come references to long route marches and much drill. Later the regiment was sent to Cairo. More marches followed. Many men fell out and often officers with humane inclinations would help some poor enlisted youngster by carrying his rifle for him.

The regiment was picked for service in the Gallipoli campaign, was embarked on the steamer Ionian, of Glasgow. For about a month Private Charlesworth fought at Sid-el-Bahr, life being a series of alternate shifts of "work and rest."

On the 26th (May) we finished the trench. On the 27th we moved to the second trench.

"A march past Sir Ian Hamilton" in Egypt appears to have been the most important event to another, whose diary is entirely of "on" and "off" duty and similar routine remarks.

The diary of another contains the owner's will on the inside page of the cover. It reads:

"My will: Everything I possess to go to my father. (Signed) Wilfred Hayes, 6th Batt. Manchester Regiment."

The entries are extremely matter-of-fact.

"May 15th, Turks advance."

"May 16th, one of our officers shot dead."

"May 21st, nothing doing all day."

Many references to attacks by the Turks follow. The Royal Scots are given much credit by the writer for their brave conduct.

No Sleep for 72 Hours. May 27th. Not a minute's sleep for three days and three nights."

"May 28th. We were obliged to move to our reserve trench."

"May 29th. During the afternoon the 8th B. M. R. (8th Battalion, Manchester Regiment) were digging in a trench, which they had advanced to during the night, when they were surprised by the Turks. They retired, leaving rifles and equipment behind."

We saw the Turks playing with their rifles and bayonets which were left behind. The artillery and infantry peppered them. The 8th Essex were to take back the trench and the Sixth, who were in the reserve trench, resting after two nights of advancing and trench digging, had to go and support them. The 8th lost heavily, although the 6th had few casualties. The 8th got the order to advance with five bayonets, but faked it, so we 6th would not let them stay in the trench and pushed them over the parapet. Some day a wounded man crawled into our trench and said that a sergeant and four men were the only survivors in a trench. Reinforcements were sent."

"May 30th. We are still in the trenches and are getting very worn and tired."

"May 31st. Turks attacking. Eighth unable to hold their own; one of our platoons to aid. The Eighth begin to retire, but the sergeant in charge of the Sixth will not allow them to retire."
