WHO PAYS? The Fruit of Folly

A rather distinguished man of 55, he sat at his desk in a dejected and listless attitude. It was 10:45 and he was still alone; still awaiting the arrival of his son-in-law and business partner whose support and help he needed more at this time than he had ever needed it before.

And then came a blow from an unexpected quarter. It was delivered in an ordinary envelope by a very ordinary messenger boy and it was altogether a very plain, business-like document. But its effect on the already discouraged business man could not have been worse if it had been dropped from above by a winged messenger of the gods of financial ruin.

Slowly Irwin opened the letter and read:

Mr. Russell Irwin, City.

Dear Sir—As Mr. Clay failed to apply for an extension last night, I have placed for collection, the note I hold against Irwin & Clay for a loan of $75,000. Out of the city today and Sunday. You must settle Monday.

THOMAS NEAL.

Dazed and stunned, and seemingly bending under a weight of suddenly

"Yes I Know Your Weakness, You Were Drunk and We are Ruined."

added years, Irwin groaned angrily for the telephone and in an imperative tone called for his partner's house number.

"Hello, Clay, this you? Well, hurry down—while you have been dallying at home we have gone under—we're ruined—completely smashed."

This was the message that had started Clay at his late breakfast; this was the message that had sent him hurriedly downtown, his headache increasing with every step to the curb, his burning temples throbbing in unison with the engine of his car.

Irwin wasted no time in preliminaries when Clay hurriedly entered the firm's luxuriously furnished private offices.

"This business," he shouted, angrily shoving the letter at his junior partner. "Fine business this, missing an appointment of such importance; neglecting to secure the extension of that note; fine business."

Clay, consoled and ashamed, answered nothing.

"Oh, Edgar, Edgar, I trusted you," continued the older man. "My only folly has been that I placed any responsibility in you. And this is the result. Why didn't you get the extension on that note?"

"I forgot," began Clay in schoolboy fashion. "I forgot. I meant to attend to it. To tell you the truth I started for Neal's office, but I met some of the boys there and I—I, I forgot me and everything else. I—well, you know my weakness, Russell."

"Yes, I know your weakness. I know, too, that you inherited it from your poor, dead father. Perhaps you are not entirely to blame. I should have known better than to have left so important a detail to you."

"I might have known what the result would be; I might have known. YOU WERE DRUNK AND WE ARE RUINED."

"I hope I'm not intruding, gentlemen."

They both started. In the doorway stood Clay's wife.

One look at Isabelle's frankly open countenance assured them that she had not overheard their discussion and both men breathed more easily.

"But your allowance, child?" interrupted the father. "You've drawn it in advance now."

A scarlet flush slowly overspread the young matron's features as she hung her head.

"I know, father, but I lost it. I played at Core's—at Mrs. Blake's—and now, unless I can get some money at once, my name will be ruined. I simply must pay my gambling debts. They are debts of honor and must be met."

Perhaps if Isabelle had made her demand at a more opportune time, perhaps if Clay had been less harsh in his refusal, old King Folly might have been foiled; might have lost two promising victims, and what follow might never have been written. Such is the weakness of man, however, such is the frailty of human nature, that forgetting entirely for the moment that his own folly of the day before had plunged his firm into virtual bankruptcy; forgetting that more than half of his wife's folly might justly be laid at Clay's own door; forgetting everything but his boiling, unreasoning rage, Edgar lashed himself into a blind fury.

"I can't give you a cent, Isabelle," he shouted, "and if you foolishly gamble again, I'll repudiate your debts."

"Very well, Edgar," she answered coldly, "what follows will be on your own head." A haughty, majestic—like a queen of tragedy—she swept from the room, leaving the two men still more depressed to wreathe with their problem—a problem that seemed without answer. And there we too, will leave them for the present.

CHAPTER III.

Peter West lay dying. And the secret that was dying with him grew heavy on his conscience. At the very time that he lay on his back, his partner were seeking to pierce the black pall of ruin that was slowly pressing down on them, he was seeking to penetrate the still blacker curtain of the future—seeking to know his fate.

Women AND THEIR INTERESTS

The Tests of Real Friendship

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

Copyright, 1915, by Star Company.

Real friendship results in a sense of freedom in association, but it does not permit of license. No friend can be so intimate that the need of delicacy does not exist. One can never be so sure of a friend that unnecessary and uncalled-for freedom of speech is permissible.

My true friend never comes to me with the belittling and causeless gossip which he hears about me. He never says, "I know you will not care," and then relates some vicious lie invented by the mind of envy. He never tells me anything disagreeable unless it is to warn me or put me on my guard against a secret enemy or against my own imprudence. He tells me the kind and pleasant words he hears spoken of me and takes as much pleasure in hearing them as I do. And he defends me in my absence even against an army of accusers.

He will say things to my face which he would not say or permit to be said behind my back.

Friendship of the highest order should banish all wearisome restrictions and formalities. If I happen to drop in on my nearest friend as she is preparing to go out with another, she should feel free to go with no fear that I will be hurt or feel slighted. The moment this fear of wounding our friends in such matters creeps in it is no longer or not yet an absolute friendship.

We can bear with the tyrannies and anxieties, fears and turmoils of love, but the calmer pleasures of friendship are jeopardized if we permit these other emotions to mar them.

Love is like the midocean, grand, beautiful and terrible, full of delight and danger, and friendship should be like the calm bay where we rest, and do not fear; it cannot give us the exhilaration of love and it must not give us the anxieties.

We feel rested and strengthened after an interview with a real friend, never irritated or worried.

The worthy and worth-while friend never chides us for not loving him enough nor begs to be loved more; he makes himself so deserving and so unobtrusive that we needs must give him gratitude and affection.

The wise friend never weighs us with his friendship—never burdens us with feelings that he cannot live without our constant devotion. It is the privilege of love alone to do that.

Love may learn and cling forever. And forever grow more dear.

But friendship must sometimes stand upon its own feet or we tire of it. If my friendship is absolute I will stand by my friend in trouble, danger and disgrace—not holding him from sinking lower. If he resents my restraint, however, and is determined to sink, I do not prove my friendship by sinking with him. I only prove my own moral weakness. Better let go my hold and save my strength to assist another who wants my help.

If he will not heed my advice or counsel, but insists upon associations and actions which injure him, I only blacken my own record and weaken my power to assist others if I stand by him. Friendship is not a higher self should not be sacrificed in a mistaken sense of devotion to another. Neither should I ask my friend to go down into the valley of despair with me—he will be a truer friend if he stands above in the sunlight and strives to lift me up beside him.

I do not want my friend to constantly urge me to accept favors, but when, in my hour of need, I ask a favor, I want him to grant it with the air of one who is the recipient rather than the giver. Neither do I want him to refuse favors on the ground of being unable to repay me, since real friendship finds payments in the bestowing of favors. An always I want him loyal, trusting and sincere in word and act; as liberal, as loving, as free from jealousy as he is full of justice, ready to praise and not afraid to reprove.

WOMAN REFUSES OPERATION

Tells How She Was Saved by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Louisville, Ky.—"I think if more suffering women would take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound they would enjoy better health. I suffered from a female trouble, and the doctors decided I had a tumorous growth and would have to be operated upon, but I refused as I do not believe in operations.

I had fainting spells, bloated, and could hardly stand the pain in my left side. My husband insisted that I try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I am so thankful I did, for I am now a well woman. I sleep better, do all my housework and take long walks. I never fail to praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for my good health."—Mrs. J. M. RESCH, 1900 West Broadway, Louisville, Ky.

Since we guarantee that all testimonials which we publish are genuine, is it not fair to suppose that if Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has the virtue to help these women it will help any other woman who is suffering in a like manner?

If you are ill do not drag along until an operation is necessary, but at once take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.
