LAWN OR GARDEN ANTS? Do Not Injure Plants—May Be Easily Controlled

There seems to be a rather exceptional abundance of the common little lawn ant, probably what is often called the garden ant (Lasius niger) this year. These little ants, yellowish brown in color, construct their small crater nests on lawns and pastures in enormous numbers, often a dozen or more to the square yard of surface.

Other species of ants may be concerned, some of them black in color, but the common species widely distributed throughout the Northern States is the one named above.

Very frequently these ants are noted on roses and other ornamental plants and on garden plants, and fears are naturally aroused that they are injuring the plants, and any damage which the plants may exhibit from other causes is naturally ascribed to the ants. Usually, however, a careful examination of the plants will reveal the existence of plant lice, the presence of which attracts the ants. These plant lice excrete a sweet liquid, of which the ants are very fond and which they collect from the plant lice without any injury to the latter. For this reason plant lice are very frequently termed "ant cows."

The presence of ants on plants, therefore, is usually an indication of the presence of plant lice or related insects, which may also excrete sweet liquids. The relation of ants to plant lice is very intimate, and the little lawn ant discussed has a record of harboring in its nests over winter plant lice to return them to an appropriate host plant the following Spring. The corn-root aphid, for example, has been found by Professor Forbes and others in nests of these ants. In this role ants can be considered as injurious, in that they assist in the overwintering and subsequent dissemination of injurious plant lice.

The latest thriller for amusement parks and similar institutions is a so-called "bowl of death" which turns from a horizontal to a vertical position and then back again as the rider drives his motorcycle at high speed around the rim. A picture of the device appears in the August Popular Mechanics Magazine. The bowl is made up of segments of perforated steel, is 15 feet in diameter, and is hemispherical in shape except for a flat section at the center and a sharp inward curve at the rim designed to furnish the rider some degree of protection against the danger of running off the edge. When the motorcyclist begins his ride the bowl is horizontal, with the open side up. As soon as the machine attains sufficient speed to ride on the vertical edge the bowl is slowly swung to a position in which the open side is vertical.

NEW ACHIEVEMENTS IN THE MOVING PICTURE FIELD

Two ingenious developments in the art of motion picture projection have recently been made which may add somewhat to the spectators' pleasure as well as broaden the photoplay field. Each achievement, while in a manner related to the other, is different both in purpose and means of execution. One makes it possible to show a film in a sun-filled room, while the other enables pictures to be displayed in open air at night under the full glare of powerful electric lights. Both methods are fully described in the August Popular Mechanics Magazine.
