

CITIZENS COMMENT FURTHER ON THE CITY IMPROVEMENTS

The Rev. Dr. C. H. Forney, who for years has been active in all civic matters, makes the following contribution to the Telegraph on improvements:

"As I think of the approaching celebration of the completion of the public improvements in our beautiful city, I am reminded of the distinction between beauty which is intrinsic and beauty which is relative. The former requires only an eye to see and taste to admire; the latter requires the power of understanding and reflection. The beauty of utility is proportioned to the degree of utility. Our municipal improvements need to be separately considered, else they pass without making any distinct impression. Those who are impressed with the real value of these achievements are comparatively few. But recount them, and their utility and beauty are conspicuous. They are our well-paved, clean streets; our delightful parks; our brilliantly lighted avenues; the city 'Front Steps' and broad walks; the tempting promenades and smooth walks with welcome fountains. These appeal to the eyes of all. But who among our four score thousands have seen old Wetzel's Swamp, notorious only for the want of all improvements, since it has become the celebrated Wildwood Park with its incalculable and hidden utilitarian beauty? The filtration plant is an object of sight worth a walk to the island; but who sees in it a vital factor in the conservation of life and health for our community? And the vast improvement of the sewage system and the resulting cleanliness of our cellars and yards, are most worthy achievements, bringing health and comfort and beauty. The true greatness of a city is not measured by population, nor wealth, nor trade, important as these are; but by the embodiment in institutions of sound axioms and principles which safeguard and promote the general health, comfort, prosperity and high moral ideals of its citizens. The civic progress which Harrisburg has made is the strongest element in putting the city 'in the heart of its citizens.' It has also elevated the citizens morally and aesthetically. These masterful achievements, it is true, have been conditioned by the qualities of our people; by their courage, their sentiment, their industry, their enlightenment; yet in Harrisburg's progress may be seen the lofty ideals worthy of true citizens, and at the same time a fine and fitting expression of civic pride and public spirit. The primitive idea of the town or village was that of protection and safety; and when to this was added the element of intrinsic and relative beauty it marked a distinct epoch in civilization. Emerson said: 'The earth laughs in flowers.' So to-day Harrisburg rejoices in improvements which promote health and sanitation; afford comfort and protection; attract visitors and capital and contribute to the moral elevation and the contentment of her people. The value of this civic progress will be evidenced in human lives, in comfort and in well-being. Harrisburg has an unsurpassed environment; yet with Newman we may say: 'If nature did much for Athens, it is undeniable that art has done much more.' And while Harrisburg is not yet 'Venice, the perfection of beauty,' it is befitting that we should rejoice together and be glad over the fact that so much which looks to that end has been carried to a successful issue."

George W. Reilly, vice-president of the Harrisburg Trust Company, said briefly: "This city need have no fear for the future, if the same active, progressive spirit continues which has characterized it since 1901. Now that it has been started, it will not be satisfied, but will go on and on ever expanding and becoming more and more beautiful and healthful and prosperous. Too much credit cannot be given to the people for the progressive spirit which has dominated this first great step in the city's development."

Frank L. Cook, the prominent Market street merchant: "When the people of Harrisburg voted for the million dollar loan for public improvements ago, some fourteen or fifteen years ago, I question very much whether one person in a hundred realized how much they were doing for the future Harrisburg. From the time work was started on them, the city took on new life and began to go forward at a good steady pace, with a healthy growth, commercially and in population—and the city growing more beautiful all the time. When is the city's progress to be compared with that of other cities? Let the good work continue—keep on with the improvements."

Let everybody enter heartily into the celebration of the completion of our municipal improvements, not forgetting to give credit to the men who have labored so hard to accomplish the great work and the newspapers which have rendered much valuable assistance."

H. A. Robinson, one of the leading West End merchants says: "This celebration is going to give us an elegant opportunity to look around and see what we really have in this city. Fifty years of continued improvement is liable to make us forget some of the earliest of these improvements. But we may sit back now and admire and have admired this beautiful, progressive city of ours."

"Naturally we of the West End have been particularly interested in watching this section grow more beautiful, more livable and more progressive through these improvements. We have at our disposal a most generous portion of the new park system. Our property owners can especially appreciate the improved sewerage. And just within this last year a real 'city air' has been injected into our uptown business centers by the installation of the new street light standards (the completion of which improvement is being anxiously awaited by the West Enders)."

"Still more recently, an unscheduled, though none the less important, improvement has been added greatly to the comfort and convenience of the residents of this section. Though dependent for the last five or six years of uptown street car service, on Third street, the jitney has most successfully stepped in and filled this long felt want."

H. C. Ross, prominent in business circles said:

"I remember before 1901 what a terrible condition this street, (meaning Third street), used to be in. Why, they used to sail boats over there in front of Ed. Herman's old cigar store. You couldn't walk across the street without being smeared with mud. Since the improvements have been completed traffic facilities have more than quadrupled. It's a pretty good old town. All those who go away are mighty glad to get back. Credit is due the ones whose brains originated the scheme."
