THE FUTURE OF THE SUBMARINE

To-day I would say without hesitation that the submarine has not replaced the battleship as the principal factor in war at sea. Taking it in its existing stage of development, a submersible vessel is useful for certain purposes only. It cannot yet be called sea-going or sea-keeping; it is not fast; ready devices for its destruction are multiplying; the aeroplane or dirigible can see it well below the surface; the net, the mine field, the destroyer are all being used to oppose it, and a new type of armed patrolboat is being built for the purpose of watching the sea's surface for signs of the mechanical whale that must come up. Submarine signals, also, although now in the infancy of development, will doubtless soon be able to detect the presence of moving submarines and give accurately their direction and distance.

It would be, of course, not unreasonable to suppose that, while the weapons for the destruction of underwater craft are being perfected, the improvement of the submarine itself will continue. Without doubt its size will increase, its engines, both surface and submersible, gain in horse power and resulting speed; its radius of action grows and its seaworthiness improves. I have said nothing of the discomfort of the officers and men on the present-day vessels, nor of the well known fact that the propelling and operating mechanism is in such an experimental stage that frequent accidents occur; these are the evils of any new apparatus—witness the automobile of fifteen years ago. But the time is not far distant when the "habitability" and safety from mishaps will make submarines as dependable as any other high-powered, complicated vessel of war. Two deterring factors will probably always be present in its development; the inability to see under water, and the necessity of coming to surface at short intervals.

The submarine has come to stay. It has taken its place, not as the sole weapon in naval offense and defense, but as an adjunct to other weapons. That it is useful for coast defense for commerce destroying, for scouting purposes, and as a part of the protection and attacking power of a battle-line fleet is established. — Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in the North American Review.

A BLUNDER OF THE OPTIMISTS

One of the fundamental blunders of modern religious work and teaching is the failure to recognize the fact that human beings, young or old, do not naturally like God and God's ways. To plan out a religious program on the assumption that they do is to make a bee-line for failure. If it were true that people naturally loved God and his ways, Jesus, would never have said: "Ye must be born again." The fundamental and primary need for all Christian work is a false start on a mistaken path.—Christian Herald.

We are bound to fail when we undertake to do heavenly things in earthly strength. There is no need to try to reach the goal of success unless we start here. Every other start is a false start on a mistaken path.—Christian Herald.
