BOHLEN DECIDES LIABILITY POINT

Mutilation or Disfigurement. Provisions Here Not Like Those in New York

Francis H. Bohlen, counsel for the Workmen's Compensation Board, has submitted an opinion declaring that an employee, who has accepted the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation act, cannot bring suit at common law against his employer for a work accident resulting in the mutilation or disfigurement of an employee.

A suit now pending in the Court of Appeals of New York, in which an employee whose ear was mutilated by a horse he was hired to drive, seeks to recover damages from his employer, is regarded by Mr. Bohlen as not very persuasive authority in support of the right of an employee similarly injured to maintain a common law action in this Commonwealth.

Mr. Bohlen points out that under the Pennsylvania act, the employee voluntarily accepts the compensation provision, while in New York he has no power to reject them. Mr. Bohlen further states that the difference in the wording of the Pennsylvania and New York Compensation acts, would prevent the decision of the New York Appellate Court even if affirmed by the Court of Appeals, from being applicable in determining the right of an employee under the Compensation act.

In discussing the status of the employee under the Pennsylvania law, Mr. Bohlen says: "First, the employee agrees to give up his common law rights to recover damages for any personal injury due to a work accident and all the harmful consequences which he suffers therefrom, in return for the compensation provided in the act. He and his family obtain a certainty of a speedy and fixed compensation whenever he is disabled or killed, in place of his previous right to full damages on the comparatively rarely occurring occasions when he could prove that the accident was due to his employer's negligence. In return he gives up not only his right to full damages for those harms for which compensation is provided, but also all rights to any compensation or damages for those very frequent harmful consequences, such as mutilation and disfigurements, which do not entail loss of earning power and are not the subject of compensation."
