A WINTER ECONOMY
 Curiously enough it is easier to economize on food in winter than in summer, and that in spite of the fact that people have larger appetites in cold weather than in hot. One reason of course is that one is not tempted to buy so many fresh fruits and vegetables, but another and more important reason is that in winter "left-overs" will not spoil easily and can be used to much advantage in making numerous and appetizing dishes. In summer to save fuel and escape heat the fire in the kitchen stove goes out as soon as possible after a meal, but in winter when the fire is needed for warmth as well as cooking baked dishes can be used to advantage. In old days a baking dish was an ugly object to place on the table, and the napkin which was draped about it did not improve its appearance. Now it is possible to match the color of one's dinner service in enameled ware, which will not crack or change with the heat of the oven. Bits of meat mixed with rice, macaroni or potato flavored with onion and a little left-over tomato make an attractive dish if served in one of these pretty baking pans.

A FINE ONION DISH
 A good, satisfying and economical supper dish for cold winter evenings is scalloped onions. Butter an enameled ware baking dish well over the inside. Put in the bottom either a thick layer of pounded up crackers or stale bread cut or broken into small pieces. Over this lay two or three layers of raw sliced onions cut moderately thick. Sprinkle the onions with salt and a dash of red pepper. Next comes another layer of bread or crackers, then onions again until the dish is full. The top layer should be the crackers or bread. Over all this pour enough milk to soak the bread thoroughly and a little over. The onions must be well cooked.

AN 18-INCH SPOON
 "He who would sup with the Devil must use a long spoon," is an old saying; but long spoons are useful and almost essential for other occasions than supping with his Satanic Majesty. Big preserving kettles, for example, cannot be stirred satisfactorily with any other implement, nor can stews or soups or many other things. An enameled ware spoon with an eighteen-inch handle is a boon in cooking. Not being metal, it is not affected by acids, and it does not get too hot to handle as does the ordinary kitchen spoon. A long handled ladle in enameled ware for dipping out jelly is another useful addition to the household outfit.
