Getting an interview with George Cockill is like pulling teeth. When there is a piece of news of interest to the public he is there with the information every time, but not until the news is fresh will he talk. There was some importance in Cockill's visit to Harrisburg yesterday. He is going to get back into the baseball game, not as an umpire, but as manager. Harrisburg can have him without interfering with Lew Ritter's rights.

The suggestion of Ban Johnson, president of the American League, that baseball players should have a representative on the National Commission is not new. Some time ago when it was announced that a reorganization of the governing body was coming, it was intimated that the players should make fight for representation. It means much for clean sport this summer.
