WHAT HAPPENED TO JANE

ning, her hopes for a resumption of the former relations between herself and her friends!

Jane understood this, yet she uttered no further protest to her husband's verdict. Instead, she went on into the little room adjoining the large bedroom and proceeded to undress.

She was ready for bed, and had put on a warm dressing gown over her nightgown, when her husband appeared at the door of the small room. As she stood there in front of her mirror, braiding her long hair, she looked very childish in the dim light of the one candle on the bureau.

Reeves had not started to undress. While he was still in a bad humor, he was secretly ashamed of the violence of his speech. But he would not apologize. Vaguely, he wished that Jane would reopen the discussion that he might have a chance to justify himself. But although he remained watching her, she did not speak. He broke the silence by a question.

"You understood this, yet she uttered on further months and on mers. "Don't be afraid."

"I heard him come in, in a temper," the housekeeper murmured, "and I heard a lot he had to say. Don't you mind, child. T'll help you in any way it can."

Jane could hardly believe the evidence of her own ears. Could this be Mary Baird, the self-contained, hard woman who had repelled all her attention.

"Tt's only me," Mary told her, and laying a hand on hers. "Don't be afraid."

"I heard him come in, in a temper," the housekeeper murmured. "I heard a lot he had to say. Don't you mind, child. T'll help you in any way it can."

"Well, I was right to refuse!" he exclaimed.

She did not deny his assertion. Indeed, she seemed not to hear it. He had a baffled feeling, as if he had become the possessor of something that eluded him, something that was only in seeming his possession. His mind was not analytical enough nor his intellect broad enough for him to understand that in marriage, as in other things, the letter killeth, and that the spirit gives life. "You understood," his wife replied.
That was all. She did not even look at him. He tried to make her do so.
"Perhaps you think I'm hard on you.
Jane, but I'm not. Many a man would have been angrier than I was after seeing what I saw tonight."

The recollection of his wife and young Guilford together caused him all at once to feel that his wrath had been insisted.

"Haven't you anything to say?" he insisted.
"Nothing." Her eyes were still upon the long braid which she had brought over her shoulder and was plaiting to the very end of the shining tresses. "I said all I had to say. I don't care to talk any more about it, please, Augustus. I made my request. You refused to grant it. That ends the discussion, "shink."

Ah, the luxury of a "strictly fresh" But at sixty cents a dozen this delicious article of diet is rather too much of a "luxury" for the average purse. Run a little egg factory of your own. Raise your own chickens, or buy them. Produce your own "strictly fresh" eggs—and EAT THEM, too. Be a millionaire in one respect. Begin any season of the year. It's easy. The man who starts and starts rightly will never wish to stop.

THIS is the first thought: Where shall I keep the birds? It is the first necessity. But large space and large houses are not at all essential for the best results with "Twelve Hens in a Backyard."

A hen is the most accommodating creature in the world. She would enjoy a thousand-acre run, but if you will feed her well and keep her busy and comfortable she will sing all the year through in a six-by-eight house, and lay you eggs by scores. Of course she will do better with more "standing room"—and liberal running room—and your sport will be measured largely by the comfort and convenience afforded in the living quarters of your fowls.

I them began taking your 'Favorite Prescription,' and it helped me so much. I always suffered so until our last child was born when I got along nicely. I shall never go through it again without your medicine."—Mas. F. W. Myers.

The mighty restorative power of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription speedily causes all womanly troubles to disappear—compels the organs to properly perform their natural functions, corrects displacements, overcomes irregularities, removes pain and misery at certain times and brings back health and strength to nervous, irritable and exhausted women.

It is a wonderful prescription, prepared only from nature's roots and herbs, with no alcohol to falsely stimulate and no narcotics to wreck the nerves. It banishes pain, headache, backache, low spirits, hot flashes, dragging-down sensation, worry and sleeplessness surely.

SINGLE COMB ORPINGTONS

COPYRIGHT 1916

The Orpington is a breed of fowls of which there are twelve varieties, and the late William Cook is given credit for their origin. He spent many years in England breeding and perfecting a fowl that would lay plenty of eggs, especially in winter, and with this in mind he was successful in bringing out the Black, White, Buf, Jubilee and Spangled Orpingtons in the order named, and in both single and rose comb varieties. Since then other English breeders have added the single and rose comb Blue Orpington.
