"You're going to the lodge this evening, aren't you, dear?" said Helen as they left the table.

"Oh, no," said Warren, turning suddenly. "I forgot to tell you. The folks said they might come up and play a little bridge."

"Really, dear? You should have told me before. We haven't a thing in the house to eat."

"That's right; we do have to give them something, don't we? Well, can't you make a few sandwiches?"

"Yes, dear; but we haven't any cream for coffee. And I ought to give them something hot. You know Louise always serves such delicious things when we go up there."

"Can't we have beer?" "We could; but what about something hot to eat?"

"I suppose Mary could go out and get something."

"Oh, I have a splendid idea, Warren. We might cream some of those oysters you brought home."

ren, having exhausted his paper, threw it down with an impatient gesture. Helen had no look up, and after a few minutes he remarked irritably.

"Must be something very interesting you are reading."

"It is," responded Helen, absently. "What is it?" after a few minutes.

"It is called 'The Question,'" said Helen.

"Haven't you anything better to do than to read such trashy literature?"

"Trashy? Why this isn't considered trashy."

"Well, why don't you read something that might improve your mind, like a standard classic, or some good poetry?"

"Is that what you do?" "It's what I would do if I had the time that you do to read and do what you like."
