MOLLY PITCHER MONUMENT TO BE UNVEILED

Pitcher Monument Commission, was named by the State and immediately plans for the marker were gotten under way. The commission, as named is made up of Roy L. Schuyler, Lock Hazen, Herman A. Miller, Easton, W. S. Wacker, Philadelphia, and W. A. Rupp, Carlisle. The monument plan, selected by the commission, is a life-size figure of Molly Pitcher as she appeared when preparing to fire the cannon. The contract was given to a Boston firm and already the model has been made in clay. Within the next few weeks the figure will be cast in bronze and by June 1 it will be shipped to Carlisle.
Elaborate ceremonies have been made for the unveiling ceremonies and in connection one of the biggest parades ever witnessed in the Cumberland Valley will be held. The affair will be far from local. It will be a State-wide celebration, and thousands of persons will be here from all parts of Pennsylvania. Committees have been named to arrange the details for the day and they have been busy since January. Military organizations, patriotic societies from all parts of the State and fire companies from all over Cumberland county will take part in the parade, which will be held in the afternoon and which will immediately precede the unveiling ceremonies.

ROOT IS WALL STREET CHOICE

Financiers, However, Say They Will Support Roosevelt Rather Than Wilson

Special to the Telegraph
New York, April 11.—A man of stanch and conservative Republicanism, who has an office in Wall street and is prominent in the financial district, was sitting in the Republican Club.
"Who is your candidate for President?" asked a friend sitting near him.
"Elihu Root," was the reply, in a voice that left no room for doubt.
"But suppose Root isn't nominated?" said the friend.
"Suppose the Republican delegates nominate Roosevelt and you have to choose between him and Wilson—whom will you vote for?"
"For Roosevelt, — him," he replied.
This man summed up the sentiment of many Republicans of Wall street. A reporter who questioned several of the leaders in the financial district who have always been staunch Republican leaning beyond doubt that a very large number of them will vote for Roosevelt if he is their party's candidate against President Wilson. They do not like Colonel Roosevelt; they would like to see him smothered in the Republican national convention; they generally say something violent when they mention his name, but they vote for him when he is nominated as the Republican candidate.
Next to Root, many of them, according to reports, would choose Justice Hughes.

But these Republicans of Wall street admit privately and regretfully that Colonel Roosevelt has created a situation, or that his friends have created one for him, which makes it dominant—perhaps the dominating—figure in Republican politics and which will probably result in his nomination. The Republicans of Wall street, therefore, realize that they may have to choose between Roosevelt and Wilson, and though they have not forgiven the Colonel for bolting the party in 1912 and for his policy in the war, their opposition to President Wilson because of his domestic policies before the war, because of his Mexican and international policies, is the factor that, first to last, determines their sentiments.
When the question, "If not Root, who?" was put to Henry P. Davison, of J. P. Morgan & Co., Mr. Davison replied:
"I'm for Root and I haven't any second choice. I do not see the necessity now for making any second choice. I want to see Mr. Root nominated at Chicago and I shall vote for him if he is. If someone else is nominated, then we will have to decide the question of voting."

Our Library Table

Antwerp to Gallipoli, by Arthur Ruhl. (Scribner's, New York, $1.50).
How little do we Americans, wrapped up in our own affairs and obsessed with the pursuit of wealth which the war has made possible—how little do we really know of the actual conditions in Europe and how little do we really appreciate and sympathize with the cheerful sacrifices which hundreds of thousands of human beings, flesh and blood like ourselves, are enduring day after day, month in and month out, in the cause of country.

This record of events and of the actual witnessing of scenes of horror and bloodshed, while perhaps exaggerated to the degree that all writers who are interested in the subject must necessarily exaggerate, still gives us one of the clearest and most realistic pictures of the countries at war as they are today. The book is written in a simple, frank in the matter of details, and conversational in style, this bird's-eye view of the war map and the intimate associations which it gives with people of foreign habits and customs is the next best thing to visiting the trenches ourselves.

A trip through Belgium just ahead of the German troops and the crushing horde of German invaders, a halt at Antwerp while shells shatter houses next to us and we shiver in our beds lest the next strike the house wherein we are lodged; a visit to Paris, where all is expectancy and uncertainty; thence to Bordeaux, the temporary capital of France, and a hasty glance at London, from which a heavy fog drives us ere we can learn much of anything; on to the German prison camps, in which French and English, Algerian and Serbian, all mingle together in the little walled-in city that is all their own, and where they take it as a matter of course and produce Bernard Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion" under their own hand; the twinkling eye of the German commandant; an armored motor takes us whizzing to the front, where we step gingerly through the trenches and watch the English, less than a hundred yards away but invisible in their own trenches, hurling bombs and standing as watch-dogs within a few seconds' walk of their enemies' best troops; we cross over the pass and enter the capital of Rumania, that little nation smaller in size than Pennsylvania, yet a factor in the world war. A careful reading of Mr. Ruhl's book will perhaps dispel the hazy impression which the average American holds of the Balkans. Finally we visit the Turks and Austria-Hungary through which we pass to the Gallician front.

One feels, after having taken this trip of one year with the author to the principal scenes of the war, more equal to solving in one's own mind just what is the correct attitude one is to take with respect to the countries that are fighting for their very lives. It is very hard to be on the outside looking in and still form a definite and unshakable conviction on a matter that has so many phases. "Antwerp to Gallipoli" will do much to crystallize the unformed sentiment of the reader toward this country or that, without violating the well-established neutrality that has been ours since the war started.

PHILADELPHIA AND PITTSBURGH, PA.

Louise Burnham. (Houghton-Mifflin, $1.25).
A most appealing love story, one of the best Mrs. Burnham has written, dealing with the patient love of a strong man, a young man of mighty intellect and power, and a somewhat wilful but no less strong-minded Chicago girl who has been reared in luxury and left in the world with a father and sensibly-married sister. Much havoc has been wrought in the hearts of many an adoring young man, but all are treated with the same unstirred friendly feeling. The leading figure in the story, next to herself, is the young man who chances to be the confidential secretary to her father, who looks with favor upon the match. Unfortunately the girl must needs be awakened to her senses by some sort of a shock. The death of her father due to financial troubles and the affixing by the girl upon the young man of the moral blame for his death brings about an acute situation which causes much mental and physical suffering until all is happily adjusted through the loyal activity of an adored music-teacher, a hard-shelled but soft-hearted old aunt, an optimistically red-headed little serving maid and a broad-shouldered young athlete and they lived happily ever after.

It is the reader's privilege in this absorbing story of love and business to watch the development of the theme and see in advance the inevitable capitulation of the fair-minded but impulsive girl to the overpowering, sacrificial and tender love of the man; and to share likewise in the man's unspoken victory over the girl's mistaken antagonism. It affords a series of thrills toward the end that refreshes and restores whatever belief may have been lost in the ultimate advantageous working out of God's law of love, which finds expression in the constant and unchanging faith and trust of the girl's adored music-teacher in ultimate happiness.
