

OF INTEREST TO THE WOMEN

"THEIR MARRIED LIFE"

"Helen, I'm going to be married," and Anne settled back in her chair to see just how much effect her news would produce.

"You are, really?" said Helen, looking at Anne's radiant face a little wistfully.

"Well, my dear, you look it."

"What do you mean, Helen?"

"Why, you look so absolutely ecstatic. Is that the way you really feel?"

"Yes, I'm afraid I do. Isn't that the way one generally feels?"

"That's the way one ought to feel anyway, dear. Now do tell me all about it."

Helen looked across at Anne as she spoke. Anne reddened in her opinion the very incarnation of twentieth century romance. Anne was in reality an independent woman. She earned her own living, and yet there was an air of utter unsophistication about her that was charming.

Her engagement to Jack Parmelee was what Helen had designated as an ideal marriage. Here were none of the more sordid elements that so often entered into the marriage relationship. Here was the perfect partnership founded on mutual likes and dislikes.

There was something reticent about Anne that prevented even the most curious from questioning her and although Jack freely admitted his feeling about him that one could not hope to fathom.

"Well!" Anne proceeded with a little flushed air of importance that was fascinating, "you see I am really in love with Jack, and he wants me to marry soon. I have found a million reasons why I couldn't possibly think of it in the past, but now that I have received my commission, there is really no real reason why we shouldn't marry. And Helen, I am so happy about it."

"Of course you are, and when is the happy day to be?"

"In the Fall."

"To Work Together"

"And are you planning all kinds of thrilling things for you and Jack to do?"

"I don't know about that. I am going home for the entire summer, and mother is going to help me to get ready. Then in the Fall, about the last of September, Jack and I can be married very quietly and go on with our work together."

"You have decided to go on with your work?"

"Of course, Helen. I never thought of anything else. Why, I shouldn't be happy a day otherwise."

Helen smiled. "Anne, you don't know how glad I am for you. And what does Frances say? Is she sorry to lose you?"

"Yes, but I don't think that Frances feels very deeply for anyone. She will miss me a little and then she will probably be glad that I am gone. I know that I do lots of things she doesn't approve of."

"It would be sure to be that way. Anne, with two people so near alike as you and Frances?"

"But I don't think we are at all alike."

"You are in the great essentials, you are both temperamental."

"Only that Frances is much more so than I am."

"Well, perhaps, but nevertheless, I'm glad you are going to marry Jack. I think he needs someone to take care of him."

Anne was silent a moment, and looking at Helen out of her big eyes for a few moments without speaking. Then she said suddenly:

"Helen, are you very conventional?"

Helen was surprised, but not for a moment would she have dreamed of allowing Anne to suspect such a thing, particularly when she saw that Anne was, perfectly serious.

"Well, dear, most people think I am, but I have a suspicion that I really am not at all."

"I wanted to ask your advice about something, and I wondered if you would understand."

"Try me and see."

"Well, Jack and I have been working at his place of late. We are doing some work together, and I have been there at night sometimes."

"Well!" said Helen expectantly.

"Nothing, only we just work and never think of it as being unconventional. Jack is such a dear that way."

"You mean that you want my advice?"

"The World Is Always Here"

Anne hesitated. "Well, yes in a way," she said finally. "I really wanted to see just how you felt about it."

"I really think that for you and Jack it's all right," said Helen decidedly. "But it is not the thing to do as far as the speech of people goes."

"But I don't care what people say as long as I really know."

"I know you don't, Anne, but we are living in a world where the speech of people has a great deal to do with our lives and ourselves. I know that you are doing this unconventional thing innocently and without thinking of what people will say. But it just can't be reckoned that way in New York city. We are judged by what we seem to do rather than by what we do. It's hard, dear, but we really must be careful."

"You mean that you really think I am doing wrong?"

Again Helen hesitated. She personally did not think it at all wrong for Anne and Jack to work together, but she hardly knew just what to advise the girl.

"Does your mother know that you do it?" she said finally. "You see dear, as long as you have asked me about it, I want to tell you what I really think."

"Just say yes or no," said Anne a little willfully.

"All right. Personally, I don't think that for you and Jack it is a bit out of the way. But in case an outsider should find out about it and make unkind comments, I shall say that I don't think you ought to do it."

"That's what my mother said," Anne confessed frankly. "And I suppose you are both right. But I don't see that when I have a wrong thought in my heart and Jack hasn't either, why I should not go ahead and do as I think I want to do. It's a hard world if every one is to be judged by the same standards of right and wrong."

And Helen silently agreed with her.

The Social Pirates Story No. 1 Little Monte Carlo Plot by George Bronson Howard. Novelization by Hugh C. Weir. Copyright Kalem Company.

(Continued from Yesterday.) "Te-ee," she said. "Perhaps I will, Charlie. You've been awfully good to me—I'm sorry I lost so much money for you!"

"I'm sorry, Mr. Holbrook," said Stanley, greatly excited. He picked up his bank book and did some rapid figuring. Then his eyes fell on a letter, and he called Mona over and showed it to her. This is what she read: "My dear son—'Why do you persist in remaining in the city? I shall be obliged to discontinue your allowance unless you give a better account of expenditures. Surely the enclosed should be sufficient for this month. Your Father. P. S.—Hope you are arranging your marriage as promised.'"

Girl Long a Prisoner Is Recovering Mind

Elkton, Md. — Miss Grace Marshall the Talbot county girl, who was kept a prisoner in her room for years, because she became infatuated with a young man, and who was later taken to the Phipps Clinic of Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, for treatment, has given some faint signs of mental improvement. The change from her former mental blank is very slight, doctors say, but it is enough to indicate that the treatment is stimulating her mind. She can now say a few words, and seems to have a few coherent thoughts that she tries to express.

SHE INVENTED 101 NEW WAYS TO GET FIRED

"If the really superior girl fails to get a job through lack of the proper effect," says Grace Margaret Gould in the May Woman's Home Companion, "what chance has the giddy little girl who puts on all the cheap finery she can get hold of? None, you may be sure. Her hair is frizzed to the limit and her skirt is cut to the limit. Her waist is flimsy and she chews gum. She has caused more forms of firing to be invented, from the polite to the rude, than any other applicant who enters a business office. And yet she may be both pretty and capable. What a pity that she doesn't know!"
