

OF INTEREST TO THE WOMEN

"THEIR MARRIED LIFE"

Copyright by International News Service

"What do you think about Anne's marriage to Jack?" Helen asked Frances as the two sat in the tiny apartment having tea together.

"I think it is just as well," said Frances, easily. From her manner no one would have supposed that she cared anything for Anne, but Helen knew better.

"You like Anne pretty well," she said, shrewdly.

"Now, whatever made you think that?" said Frances, snipping a thread and smiling one of her brilliant smiles.

"Well, to tell you the truth, because you and she have managed to live so amicably together."

Frances looked up in surprise. "Why, Helen, did you really think it would be too much of an experiment?"

"I really did," said Helen, laughing. "You see, I know you so well dear, and I know that Anne was quite opposite from you in temperament, even though she won't believe me."

"I should say she is," said Frances quickly. "She's a million times nicer."

"Oh, no, she isn't," denied Helen. "but she isn't quite so selfish."

Frances only laughed. "Of course, she isn't as selfish as I am. She's a real dear, and, of course, I shall miss her terribly. But I think it's better for her to marry Jack. They are so well suited, and she loves him much more than she really believes."

"Then if you are going to miss her so much, why did you say that about it being just as well?" said Helen curiously.

"Well, I do think it will be better for her. Besides, I am beginning to chafe under the domestic routine of this establishment. I know that it's sweet and homy, and quite as artistic as it is necessary to have it, but I just long for the old days sometimes when I am in a particularly wild mood. I long for the roominess of the studio and my solitary loneliness, and everything connected with the old life."

"Then why did you ever plan to live with Anne?"

"Because," said Frances dryly, "I am genuinely fond of her. I didn't like the idea of having her live just anywhere while she was in New York with no one to look after her, and I conceived the brilliant idea of making a home for her."

"Do you mean to say, Frances Knowles," said Helen in amazement, "that you have taken this apartment for no other reason than to make a home for Anne?"

"It is hard to convince you, isn't it?" said Frances quietly.

Helen sat still in perfect silence. After the talk that she had had with Anne and her motherly advice about not living with Frances Knowles. No wonder the child adored her.

"No wonder Anne loves you, as she does," Helen said aloud.

"Does she love me?" queried Frances, the soft material in her lap showing for a moment the tenderness of her slim fingers.

"Does she?" Why she simply idolizes you. She has you on a pedestal a mile high."

"The dear," said Frances softly. And then, with a return to her own light manner, "Well, it's nice to have someone care."

"Frances Knowles," said Helen severely, "you carry a pose about with you continually. Why don't you let people love you?"

"Because I don't want people to love me. Most people bore me to tears. I want the love and friendship of a few people, but as for wholesale affection from the uninteresting proletariat, I don't want it, never have and never shall."

"You would make an interesting person in a debate with a socialist, wouldn't you?" said Helen laughing.

"Can't help it, that's the way I feel."

"But seriously, Frances," said Helen after a moment's lull in the conversation. "Hasn't this apartment interfered seriously with your work? I remember now that you never could work with people about."

"Sometimes it has, and then I have gone for a walk until I could properly control my temper to the extent of playing amicably as you say with Anne and her friends. But Anne has been dear and considerate always, only so many people love her and that means company at any time of the day or night. Anne has the faculty of making friends wherever she goes."

"I know, it's because of her ready sympathy."

Frances is Well Pleased

"Exactly. But as things are now, it's just as well for us to separate. My mission is finished. Anne doesn't need me any longer, and I have the knowledge that for once in my life I have put another person's interests before my own."

"What are you going to do after Anne is married?"

"Well, Anne is going home to Kansas this summer. She has invited me out, and I think I shall go for a little while. We are going to give the apartment up as soon as she is ready to leave, and I am going to scout around for a place of my own, as near like the old one as possible, and more convenient. I can afford to pay more now. Then I am going to buckle down to real work."

Frances was beginning to be very well known through her work in the Scroll. She had written two serials and her short stories were in demand. There was a quality about her work that was distinctly different from the general run of fiction. Helen had envied her ability more than once and the money that she made so easily. Frances still retained her position with the newspaper, but was thinking seriously of giving it up.

"You see, Helen," she said in reply to a question, "I am busier than ever this year. I am going to write a book."

"Are you really, Frances?"

"Yes, why not? Avery Atwood told me long ago that it would be but a matter of time before I would be attempting something of the kind. And now I am anxious to begin. Every day I wait seems a lost opportunity."

"And you can't begin till you have the proper surroundings?"

Frances nodded. "Yes, I'm waiting. Foolish, isn't it?"

Again Helen marvelled. She was being shown an entirely different side of this girl's character. Frances wasn't always selfish. Even the crepe de chine in her lap was something for Anne's trousseau. Again Helen wondered, if her feeling for Avery Atwood would always be a closed chapter.

found her papers regular. Even her crew spoke English, expressed sympathy for the allies and the hope that the patrol boat would not encounter a submarine. All this time the German submarine accompanying the steamer remained submerged.

After reshaping the course of the expedition and while creeping along the north coast of Ireland, another British patrol boat was sighted. The patrol fired a shot across the bow of the tramp and signalled to the effect that they were about to board her. The tramp steamer was then ordered to accompany the patrol boat.

Crew Sinks Vessel
"After steaming for some distance the tramp vessel hoisted the German flag and was sunk by her own crew in accordance with instructions given before leaving Germany. The patrol boat sent an armed crew to rescue the Germans who then confessed their mission.

The patrol also found a collapsible boat in which were Sir Roger Casement and another man. It is said that the submarine commander before leaving Kiel, received orders that, whatever befell the expedition, the presence of Casement was no longer desired in Germany and that when the plans miscarried Casement was placed in the boat and left to his fate.

Sir Roger Insane?
Sir Roger Casement, it is reported, has expressed belief that the uprising in Ireland would be a failure on account of his capture. His leadership, he said, was necessary to the success of the movement.

Several newspapers support the theory advanced by A. Conan Doyle a year ago that Sir Roger is insane. The Westminster Gazette advocates that he be disposed of by placing him in a lunatic asylum.
