"Is there any chance that she would make a serious attempt against us?" he asked. "You know—this sort of thing may be all very well in Corsica, but it seems pretty far fetched here in New York!" "You woulg not say so if you knew ue of Corsica," said Mary, with a real-isticablver. "She is quite right. Were I in her place—if she were trying to take you from me—I should do as she is doing. It would be for my honor!" Harrasford almost wished he had never set eyes upon either of them. Al-

CHAPTER XXIII (Copyright, 1916, Star Company.) The day on which Myra was to lunch with Pery Martin dawned dark and lowering. By eight o'clock snow began to fall and soon the air was thick with whirling flakes. The wind blew hard, and it was plain that a March snow-storm had attacked the city. Martin ordered two cocktails, and, as he regarded these items as mat-ters of course, Myra did not protest. She did not want to appear pruddish, and she wanted still less to let this man suspect that she was not in the editors who, he might fancy, were clamoring for her work.
