Story No. 4

A WAR OF WITS

Plot by George Brenson Howard. Novelization by Hugh C. Wair. Copyright Kalem Company.

"Don't be absurd, doctor," she said when he ventured to protest. "Mr. Winthrop's an old friend! And you—well, I've known you a very short time, but if we have become such good friends!"

Hyoecine growled at that, but he couldn't resist the temptation. However, the result was that he stopped worrying about how much money Mary had. He was crazy enough about her not to care, to tell the truth.

"Marty—you've missed your vocation!" Mary told McMurtha, one night, when they were alone. "You've made more money on the stage than you've ever thought of pulling down as a cold-cream man and card expert."

"Oh, well," said Marty McMurtha, deprecatingly. "I always thought I ought to give the poor suckers a run for their money! Besides, you're just flattering me. This doctor person is so stuck on you he isn't paying any attention at all to me. Pretty good looking guy, too. It's a wonder to me you didn't fall for him."

"Never," said Marty, with conviction. "If I ever do fall in love it will be with an honest man!"

"Some folks are honest, admitted Marty. You are yourself. Now—well, ever since I was knee high to a grasshopper I've just figured that if anyone had a thing I wanted it just the same as he belonged to me. And it usually did, too," he added, pensively.

Marty laughed. She knew Marty. He had absolutely no sense of wrong doing, seemingly; he couldn't distinguish between right and wrong. But he had the code of his own game, and was given, could be depended upon absolutely. He had never been known to break an agreement.

"Say—if you're planning to put one over on this doctor I'd better show you a few things," Marty said. "Give me a new deck of cards."

He took the cards and steamed off the revenue stamp. Then he selected certain cards and shuffled them. Even Mary could scarcely distinguish the doctored cards from the rest, but Marty called every one of them correctly as he dealt of hand after hand. He performed miracles of skill when he dealt, too. Then he shuffled the cards, let Mary deal them, and called the five hands she dealt off without looking at a single card.

"I'll fix up a special code you can work by turning your rings, too," he said. And he did. "Now—start your game! I'm ready, and so are you!"

Before he left, Mary the so-called Winthrop replaced the marked deck in its package and restored the stamp to its place. Apparently the cards were exactly as they had come from the factory.

And that night Hyoecine, calling to see Mary, was disgusted to find Winthrop with her. He wanted her to accompany him to the Casino—and Mary knew, from Mona, that he had cashed a big check that day.

"Ah, stay here, instead," she said. Mr. Winthrop will join us when we get up here—you can have your excitement here!"

He hesitated; then he yielded. He didn't want to leave her with Winthrop. Mary sent for cards—cleverly she substituted the doctored pack for the new one. There was no chance of chance in the game that followed. Marty cast caution to the winds when he saw how excited the doctor was. And in less than an hour Hyoecine was stripped of all he had. Winthrop was the big winner. Mary was a few dollars only ahead. Winthrop, yawning, got up and excused himself.

Hyoecine was angry, and, for a moment, suspicious. But Mary was so quick with her sympathy, and reproached herself with such apparent sincerity for her part in his loss, that he found himself unable to believe that he had anything more than bad luck to regret.

"Oh, what's the difference?" he said, impulsively. "I can get plenty more where that came from! And then he turned toward her with sudden fierce jealousy. "You don't care for that dude from Boston, do you?" he cried. Mary hesitated a moment.

"No," she said, softly. "Ah!" cried the doctor. "Then—wait until I get the money! Will you come away with me then, in the morning? We can be married on the way North!"

"Oh!" cried Mary. "I—you're so quick—do you expect me to decide now? Come to me in the morning—and I will give you my answer!"

And with that assurance he had to be content. In the morning he came to her. But not before Mona, early as it was when he came.

"He got another check from her!" said Mona. "The biggest of all. Here is the drug—some of his own supply. Hurry, Mary—he'll be here as soon as he has had the check cashed."

"Hide in my bedroom," said Mary. "I'll be ready when he comes." She had only just time enough for the preparations she had to make before he came.

"I've got the money!" he cried, eagerly. "And now—I want my answer!"

Marty made a gesture of surrender, and the next moment he clasped her in his arms. But he started back at once with a sharp cry, looking at his finger. On it there appeared a tiny spot of blood.
