DR. PHELPS TALKS TO AUTHORS CLUB

Shakespeare's Relation to the Stage Subject of Wonderfully Fine Lecture

Dr. Wm. Lyons Phelps, professor of English literature at Yale College, in his lecture in Boyd Memorial Hall last evening before the Authors Club and their guests brought vividly to his audience the power and depth and beauty of the works of William Shakespeare. Mrs. Maurice E. Finney, president of the organization, introduced the speaker.

Dr. Phelps dealt chiefly with Shakespeare's relation to the stage. Out of 37 authentic plays, there are but a pitifully few are produced in the English tongue. So many of the really great Shakespearean actors have passed away both in England and America that the interpretation of the well-known characters to-day fall far short in finish and understanding that of a decade ago. Shakespeare's plays, as well as modern dramas could be from the same lines when merely read or studied that, in Dr. Phelps' opinion, they cannot be truly appreciated unless they are acted. Above all, such poetry, such mystery in his language that the older one grows and the more one studies the more Shakespeare appears to the literary mind.

"The character of Hamlet, for instance," he said, "is the most interesting in the history of literature. Critics have never been able to determine if he was insane or not. Nevertheless, for over 300 years he has been able to hold public attention. Could a mad man do that? Hamlet is so real, so human, just because he is so complex as to be labeled. Above all, he was a gentleman. This is just why the English actor, Forbes Robertson, interprets the role so well. He, too, is essentially a gentleman."

"We know very little of the real personality of Shakespeare, but I am convinced that for his day he was considered a very good actor. His good taste and the quality of the work of stagecraft show in his talk on acting which the character Hamlet gives. He advocated a natural quietness of manner and tripping easy flow of words. Above all, he had affection, musing and big phrases."

In speaking of the relation of the stage to education Dr. Phelps regretted that the American theater is so far apart from the national life and consciousness. He thinks every town should support its own stock company where Shakespeare's plays as well as modern dramas could be produced. Last month in New York there was a notable production of "The Tempest" in the Century theater. One of the most interesting features of the production at prices ranging from 10 to 50 cents. Their absorbed interest was the best proof of the wisdom of such an opportunity. In Germany when a new play comes out of the big cities and makes a decided hit, every township, borough and village produces it within a month with their own money so that the whole country discusses it at once. The intellectual life is grasped by all the people together and the second and third rate cities do not have to wait for the next season before the road company drifts its way for a road stand with a play which by this time is old—as is the case with so many American towns.

Dr. Phelps paid a grateful tribute to Booth, Barrett and Salvini, great interpreters of Shakespeare; to Richard Mansfield, the most intellectual actor of his generation; to Mary Anderson, the most beautiful "Rosie" ever on the stage and to Robert Mantell, still living, who worked his way from cheap melodrama to the plays of Shakespeare.

Especially interesting was his account of the playing of "Othello," in Tokio, Japan. A Japanese company, desirous of producing a play like the rest of the world, engaged, visited England, France, Germany and Italy to study plays and methods of acting. Returning home they produced the great Shakespearean tragedy in their own tongue. Although in many ways the Japanese public disapproved, the humanity of it got them and the play made a big hit.

Dr. Phelps' lecture ran a vein of delicious humor which delighted his audience from his childhood studies of Shakespeare because his old aunt woke him to discuss the great man's works for a couple of hours at five every morning. But all the serious, intellectual side of him was in the "throne of the great poet" during 300 years has left his "soul in men's hearts."

Following the lecture there was a reception for Dr. Phelps and his audience with the Authors Club as hosts.

Gifts for those who will Graduate

Commencement gifts that are distinctive in beauty, quality and sentiment should be considered.

Beauty enters largely into the selection as the first mission of a gift is to please as well as to carry an expression of good will.

Quality is of supreme importance, because if the article does not turn out satisfactory the sincerity of the giver is discredited.

Unless the gift is both attractive in appearance and dependable in quality the sentiment is impaired.

Headquarters for Gifts of Beauty, Quality and Sentiment

Here are hundreds of beautiful articles in jewelry representing the highest skill and refinement in the jeweler's art.

The quality of every article is guaranteed by our reputation for reliability and strict integrity jealously maintained for nearly a quarter of a century.
