OF INTEREST TO THE WOMEN

Helen was genuinely tired as she laid her head on the pillow and drowsily prepared to go to sleep. It had been a wearisome day, but everything was finished now All the rooms were in order and the summer slips had davenport. Warren had finally admitted that he liked the guest room much better than their own bedroom, and Helen felt at last that her efforts had not been in vain.

Warren's regular breathing told her that he had fallen asleep instantly, and with a little sigh she nestled closer underneath the warmth of the silk comfortable and closed her eyes.

It seemed hours later that she wasked suddenly, conscious that something was wrong. She listened for the sound that had wakened her. Could it be Winifred's room and, as she did, heard again the sound that had wakened her. It was an ominous rasping sound—a sound that filled her heart with terror as she quickly turned on the light.

Winifred was crouched up in one corner of the bed, her face dark and flushed and her breathing choked and gasping. She was too ill to raise her head from the pillow, and Helen flew over to the bed and raised the child's head on her arm.

Winifred opened her eyes.

Winifred opened her end or was till holding Winifred in his arms.

While the Lincoln Highway is now while the Lincoln Highway is now more or less thoroughly marked from New York to San Francisco, nevertheless there have been many points where the marking has not been as thorough as it should have been, and also the marking has not been of a standard character.

The Lincoln Highway Association now plans to send a crew of four men in two Willys-Overland cars specially decorated by that company for the purpose, across the Lincoln Highway, painting the poles in a standard and uniform fashion, eight feet from the ground, about six to the mile, and four at the turns. A stencil reading "right" or "left" will also be used to indicate the direction of the turns.

While the Willys-Overland Company has provided the cars for this undertaking, the local communities through which the markings will be done have supplied the necessary funds for the payment of the painters.

Statue Will Be Placed at Terminus of Lincoln Highway

San Francisco, Cal., June 5. — It has been announced that the California Club expects to complete negotiations for the purchase of the famous Fraser statue, "The End of the Trail," which stood in the Panama-Pacific Exposition grounds and which attracted the widest and most favorable attention.

It is thought that this statue is particularly suitable to mark the western terminus of the Lincoln Highway in Lincoln Park and every effort is being made to have it placed there. The work is certain to be admired by all visitors to San Francisco and reflect a pleasing credit to the city.

TO REBUILD HIGHWAY

Lancaster, Pa., June 5. — Contracts have been let for resurfacing and rebuilding the entire course of the Lincoln Highway across Lancaster county, an improvement which will be greatly appreciated by the summer's tourists, thousands of whom are expected to visit this wonderfully beautiful section of Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania.

Six miles of the road will be entirely rebuilt under the specifications of the State Highway Department, and the remaining portion will be graded, filled and rolled and a surface dressing put down for a considerable part of the distance.

"Nothing about a man of his sort is ever quite certain," said Mary. "But I think I'm as sure of him as it's humanily possible to be. He's given himself away pretty completely. Now I'll see what the effect of worrying him a little is."

"Well—we've got big stakes to play for, this time, Mary. His wife's happiness, and her whole future, depend on the way we work this out. This time, it's certain, we're unselfish. I know I'd never have consented to this adventure except for her."

"Nor I," said Mary. "No matter how bad things were. I'd never have driven a mile with Goodwin Clay for my own sake."

Mona Disguises Herself as a Man.

Mary, after maintaining absolute silence and seclusion for a couple of days, finally wrote to Clay. And so quickly that she knew he must have acted as soon as he had read her note, he called her on the telephone.

"You gave me a fine scare," he complained. "I thought something had happened to you. Sure you're all right?"

"All right—yes," she laughed. "Otto was getting ready to go away, you see, and he was awfully exacting.

"Well, he's gone, has he?" said Clay, "Yes, he's gone. The coast is clear."

"Well, he's gone, has he?" said Clay.

"Yes—I'll be glad. Soon?"

"In half an hour."

Her hair was long and fell about he ears and low on her forehead. Her coast was of velvet; she had, deliberately, preserved much of the femininty of her appearance. She wore a flowing Windsor tie, and a low collar, with deep points. And in her hand she had a violin case.

"You're perfect, Mona," said Mary.

"You're lotto—just as I've described him, over and over again. Now—get that wild look into your eyes."

Mona practiced before a mirror, and they both laughed at the effect she produced.

"Will I do?" said Mona, anxiously.

He was on time, and Mary waited for Clay's arrival. He was on time, and, so much in awe of her did he stand that he was deferential, almost timid, in his manner, when she admitted him. This was very different from most of his affairs. He did not believe that Mary was really so different from the rest, but he did understand, somehow, that she was of a finer sort, and that it would be easy to frighten her. So he had toned down his usual rough and bolsterous way to a considerable degree.

"I'l'a a relief to have Otto go away."
