Bremen Reported on Way to an American Port

Amsterdam, July 12.—Another commercial submarine, the Bremen, constructed by the same company that built the Deutschland, now in an American port, already has left harbor, according to the Berlin Vossische Zeitung.

This statement was made by the newspaper in giving details regarding the ownership of the Deutschland. The first steps for the establishment of a firm of ship owners to engage in traffic by means of commercial submarines, it says, was taken in the autumn of 1915 by Alfred Lohmann, then president of the Bremen Chamber of Commerce.

The Deutschland, adds the account, was built in the Germania yard at Bremen, the Deutsche Bank and Lohmann.

At least eight submarine merchantmen, it was authoritatively learned here, now are building at Kiel and with these, in addition to the Deutschland and the Bremen, Germany expects in a measure to re-establish her lost commercial shipping connection with the rest of the world.

The view here is that no such project would have been undertaken had not the German interests behind it been thoroughly satisfied that the status of the vessels was unquestioned.

The Social Pirates

Story No. 12 The Disappearance of Helen Mintern

Plot by George Bronson Howard. Novelization by Hugh C. Weir. Copyright Kalem Company.

"I understand you have something to tell me." Mona met his appraising glance boldly, and repeated the story she had told Madame Suro. Slattern heard her through without comment.

"It is scheduled for —" The girl's sentence was interrupted by a sound of a scuffle, and a vigorous hammering at the street door. Slattern, with an oath, sprang back into the corridor, followed by Madame Suro and Mona. "It was evident that the 'raid' was already in progress."

Slattern turned swiftly to Madame Suro, and she met his mute question with a nod.

"Ever since has been cleared away," she said. "I took care of that—as soon as I heard the girl's story."

Slattern sprang to a hidden door, pulling it open after him, and shutting the concealed door, just as the sounds from the front of the building showed that Madame Suro had admitted the presumable officers of the law. After a reasonable length of time Slattern returned to ascertain if the officers had gone. In a few moments he was back at Mona's side.

"I rather fancy that your friend, Carson, is almost convinced that he was on a blind trail!" He lighted a fresh cigar with a chuckle. At that moment a woman's suppressed scream rang through the building, to be smothered the next instant.

Slattern threw away his match with a curse, but Mona pretended not to be conscious of anything other than the ordinary, although she was straining her ears in the hope of a repetition of the cry which she had heard from a room below, and there was no doubt that a rough hand had silenced the mouth from which it had been uttered. It was the same woman who had called in vain from the covered taxi-cab? She said that Slattern was watching her covertly out of the corner of his eye, and tried to smile.

"Shall we be going back?" she asked. "Oh, the coast is clear enough now," said Slattern rather absently. He led the woman to the street door, and again into the Beauty Parlors. Madame Suro was planning on her hat, evidently preparing to go out for dinner. Except for the dimly lighted street, there was no sign of the "raid," which had threatened to disturb the serenity of the place, and the liberty of its occupants.

"I think we are under obligations to Miss Jenkins," said Slattern. "Mona the name she had offered to Madame Suro. 'What do you think you see in that?' she asked, and he asked, plugging his hands into his pocket.

"The girl made a gesture of protest. 'A dollar! I told you I was not doing it for money—but to get back at Carson! I rather think he will be sorry before he is through!'"

Slattern granted. "Have it your way! But just the same I am not a man to be taken in by a woman's call at my office in the morning? It is just possible that we can be of mutual benefit to each other," promised Mona, as Slattern led the way to the street door. She smiled a farewell, and made her way down the steps to the street, conscious that both Slattern and Madame Suro were staring after her.

"I am so glad Slattern is in the morning," she finished. "I have an idea that he is getting a better idea of her capacity to employ in the same capacity in which he thinks I worked for you, Mr. Carson."

"She was right. When she called on the political boss next day he was plainly much taken not only with the cleverness of James Duan, but with her wit, and made it clear that he considered himself much the gainer and Carson the loser by her change of quarters."

"You can be of much help to me," he went on. "As a first step, make up your mind to give further evidence."

"Why should I do that?" asked Mona. Slattern winked. "So that you can keep me informed of his plans. Don't you see my interest? If you can think him any more devoted to his reform plans, you can let me know in advance of anything in the wind."

"See how you are smart!" cried Mona admiringly.

"Oh, they will have to get up early to arrive at the office," admitted the Boss, patting his chest.

Mona promised to meet him at Madame Suro's place for a little informal luncheon at noon, and hurried back to her apartment, where she found Mary waiting for her.

"Quickly she commanded. 'The time has come for you to take your part. Are you ready?'"

"Try me," said Mary, impatiently. A few minutes later she was seated at the typewriter, and Slattern was busy with his pen.

"Slattern was obliged to leave hurriedly before the colored maid served the breakfast, but he remained long enough to give further evidence of the high admiration he was beginning to have for Mona. In fact, Madame Suro, after her luncheon, had found the trio gathered around a cosy little table in Madame Suro's own room, enjoying really delicious menu."
