

OPERATIONS WILL NOW BE DEFINED

Workmen's Compensation Board Will Have Important Session Here Wednesday

The difference between "major" and "minor" surgical operations under the workmen's compensation act will be taken up by the board, at its meeting in this city next Wednesday.

Under the act the medical expenses granted for the first 14 days may amount to $25; or if there has been a major operation $75. It has seemed to those administering the act that every operation has tended to be a major rather than a minor one.

To obviate further misunderstanding the Workmen's Compensation Board, through Harry A. Mackey, its chairman, appealed to Dr. Patterson for an official definition.

The term major operations would include the setting of fractures of long bones and reducing of subluxations, providing accuracy and efficiency of reduction and retention be demonstrated by X-ray taken before and after surgical treatment.

BRITISH CHIEF WORKS SILENTLY

Sir Douglas Haig, Directing Offensive, Is Adverse to Publicity

British Headquarters, France, July 13. — (Correspondence of the Associated Press). — No military leader is more averse to publicity or works more silently than Sir Douglas Haig, the British Commander-in-Chief in France.

Probably not one man out of ten of the million or more under his command would recognize him if they saw him. Not given to reviews or any kind of display, this quiet and studious Scotsman was the choice of the progressive, practical, driving element of the army as the one fit by equipment, training and experience to succeed Sir John French.

There is a story that he entered the army as the result of a boyish wager. He went through Oxford with distinction before he went to the military school at Sandhurst.

It was in Berlin in the nineties that I met a Captain Haig who was studying German and the German army, said an Englishman. "I was struck by his industry—not a brilliant man, perhaps, but a sound and well-balanced one.

He studied the French army, too, and the history of its campaigns with the systematic thoroughness that he applied to everything. It was the same with his pastimes as his profession, whether he had talent for it or not he made himself a first-class golfer.

At the British Army Staff College, where officers learn organization, there was a marked man before he acted as chief of staff to General French in South Africa.

Of the men of command rank in the British Army in August, 1914, he and Sir William Robertson—another studious man who had risen from the ranks, is now chief of staff in London—were the two who were appraised by the generation of officers who had developed since South Africa as having prepared themselves for the direction of large bodies of troops on the scale of continental warfare.

Going out in command of the First Army of the British Expeditionary Force Sir Douglas had seventeen months, Mons, Ypres and Loos, of the warfare of the western front which all agree is the toughest school any soldier has ever known.

There was no doubt who commanded the First Army. It was Haig. He was no figure head for the work of an able chief of staff.

When anyone asked at the front who was the best man to take Sir John's place the answer was almost invariably: "Haig." He had not captured the army's imagination, but his reason, the tribute was one to brains.

The new army was arriving in great numbers from its English drill grounds when he took over command. His country expects him to make it an instrument of success in the successful offensive on the Western front where the four month's effort of the Germans at Verdun, the French effort in Champagne and the British effort at Neuve Chapelle and Loos convince many military circles that the feat is impossible.

His first operation, carried out without a hitch and unknown to the Germans, was the capture of the trenches occupied in the Arras sector by General Petain's army which was released for Verdun.

A wisp of a flag and two sentries designate the entrance to the chateau smaller than that occupied by many division generals which is the headquarters of the commander-in-chief. Anyone who expects to be ushered into officers with wide running in and out of doors and telephone bells ringing will be disappointed.

Aids Are Crooks

The only occupants of the chateau beside Sir Douglas are his private secretary and his aids who are "crooks" which is the army word for officers who have been wounded and are not fit for the physical exposure of the trenches.

The hour of an appointment is exact to the minute; and whoever has one at his chateau is expected to be there on the minute. General Headquarters' time. There is little ceremony. Life at that small chateau has a real soldierly simplicity.

One of the aids receives the caller; and a minute later the man with iron gray hair and mustache, sturdy, athletic of build, slightly above medium height, comes into the hall could not be mistaken whether in or out of uniform, for anything but a soldier though something about the well-chiseled regular features also suggests the soldier.

One of the rooms of the ground floor the walls are hung with maps including a series which have been crowded on a roller. Any portion of the front in all its details may be referred to in a moment in the center of the room a desk; and against the wall a table with more maps and drawings and some of those strange photographs from aeroplanes of gray-blue lines trench systems in a field of shell and mine craters which make one think of the dead world of the moon.

New York, July 21. — Orders from South American countries for large quantities of foodstuffs, farming implements, household articles and other materials used in domestic pursuits were held up yesterday by the action of the British Consulate in extending to this country the blacklist of the Foreign Trade Department under the British Trading with the Enemy Act.

ner and then some after dinner. If he does down to the lines or perhaps to confer with General Joffre in the one car which alone of all the cars carrying staff officers and generals along the roads flies the British flag the routine for that day is broken. Sleeps Long Hours. Like General Joffre he sleeps long hours. A rested mind is a clean mind for great responsibilities. Like von Hindenburg he never reads a fiction. When reading has not to do with his profession it is of serious books and monthlies and quarterlies. Even during the battle of Ypres when it was touch and go with disaster he slept as soundly as Joffre during the battle of the Meuse. At a crisis of the retreat from Mons he remarked as quietly as if he were giving a direction to an aid: "We shall have to hold on here for a while if we all die for it." There is never any fustion about these modern scientific soldier organizers. Again during the retreat when a certain general became somewhat demoralized Sir Douglas took him by the arm and walked up down with him in silence till he was over his fit of nerves on that terrible August day. Those who work with him know that his sign of anger is a prolonged silence of a telling kind. He has temper but does not let it get past his lips, they say. He has, too, a keen sense of humor, with a Scotch flavor. The impression he leaves on a caller as much of when the blow will struck as a corps commander of a staff department head. A quiet order from that quiet room and then the struggle, which by the token of the commander's strong chin and imperturbability, he will carry through with unbending resolution and Scotch "canniness." Being a good Scot he goes every Sunday morning to a little wooden Presbyterian chapel which has been erected on the outskirts of headquarters town where he sits in the company of Scottish officers and soldiers during a good Scotch sermon and a long one, too.
