

OF INTEREST TO THE WOMEN

"THEIR MARRIED LIFE"

Copyright by International News Service

The day that Helen had hoped would be so happy was not successful after all. Warren, who was plainly quite interested in Miss Wilcox, had answered her say badinage all during the lunch at the Waterfalls. This fact had left Helen to the young artist who was Lola Wilcox's companion, and as Helen felt neither light hearted nor gay, she did not appear at her best, and there were heavy silences.

"What's the matter with you?" he queried. "You've hardly said a thing since the meal started." "Well, you and Miss Wilcox talked so much that I hardly had an opportunity." "Nonsense; the conversation was general enough. Why didn't you try to make it pleasant for that young chap with her? You sat next to him."

"Yes, and Miss Wilcox sat on the other side. Why didn't she talk to him? They were together." "Warren shrugged his shoulders. "You are determined to take that view of it, why have it your own way. I simply remarked that you were unusually quiet."

"I'm surprised that you noticed that fact, you were so busily occupied," Helen said childishly. She was sorry afterward that she had admitted the fact that she was jealous. It was not good for any man to have a woman admit jealousy; it took away a woman's choicest weapon, her pride.

Helen had hardly eaten a thing. The good lunch that she had hoped Warren to order had been taken away almost untasted. She could not have eaten if she tried, and when they finally left the room all her exultation had departed.

"Shall we motor down to the beach?" "It really makes no difference to me," Helen said shortly. "I suppose you are going to make yourself disagreeable," Warren remarked testily. "I swear that you never go anywhere that you don't spoil it all by taking exception to something I do."

"Warren, that isn't true, but I did think that you might have left Miss Wilcox go to some other table instead of asking her to join us." "I don't agree with you. What harm did it do to have them sit at our table for the short time they were in the dining room?"

"Warren's Explanation" "They probably would have preferred being alone but they couldn't refuse to stay when you insisted." "I insisted because I thought it was the thing to do," and Warren busied himself with the car. Helen knew that he was as far as asking Miss Wilcox to sit at their table was concerned. If Warren had not seemed so interested in the woman Helen would not have dreamed of protesting.

"You like her pretty well, don't you?" she observed as they started, with her, but if she did, she was doomed to disappointment for Warren replied with some enthusiasm, for him.

"Yes, I think she is a mighty brainy woman." "I thought you didn't like that type." "I don't like the masculine type like Mrs. Dalton nor the hard type like the woman who lives under us, but I do like a woman with brains and personality. Miss Wilcox is brainy without being a bluestocking, and she is one of the best looking women I ever met."

Helen sat perfectly still. Her face felt as though it had been frozen and she was helpless to retort. Miss Wilcox was exactly opposite to Helen in every respect. She was brilliant where Helen was simple, had plenty of poise where Helen lacked it, and was able to make her own way in the world, and was still sweetly feminine.

Helen knew that such women were most dangerous to a man, whether he was married or single. Frances was that type. Little Anne had some of the qualities, but was too simple to try to exert her power. Once more Helen wished inordinately for brains and independence.

Helen, with the choice of their destination left to him, turned off Fifty-ninth street and entered the Queensboro bridge. The day was lovely, and the heat that had been oppressive that morning was diminished by a cool breeze. Helen determined to throw off her unhappiness and to appear as light-hearted as possible. She wished for the power to mask her feelings that other women seemed to possess. Nothing of late had gone her way, and she felt depressed and miserable.

To Send Winifred Away "Well, we needn't talk about the subject forever," she said finally, with a light laugh. "There is something else I wanted to speak to you about. Do you know, dear, we ought to send Winifred out of the city. I thought of sending her to mother's. She isn't strong enough to stand a New York summer."

"Why, there isn't any danger as far as Winifred is concerned." "Yes, there is, Warren. You entirely different role. In this new feature, 'An Apostle of Vengeance,' Mr. Hart is shown as the son of a family of Kentucky feudists, who loses even his mother's love when he refuses to take part in a feud. Chester Conklin, the funny little man from the Keystone studios, is shown in a new two-reel comedy, 'Casey at the Bat.' A picture that is based on the famous poem of the same name, that was written more than a century ago, and was printed originally in a comparatively obscure newspaper and reprinted thousands of times in other magazines and newspapers. Out of this grows the plot for this new play. A new two-reel Keystone comedy will be on the same program.

The Social Pirates

Story No. 14 THE MUSIC SWINDLER

Plot by George Bronson Howard. Novelization by Hugh C. Weir. Copyright Kalem Company.

A look of sadness tinged the handsome face of newspaper Carson, the young millionaire social worker and philanthropist, as he paused under the flickering rays of the corner street light. "Are you satisfied with your glimpse of the slums at night?" he asked Mona Hartley, who, with Mary Burnett, had been coming to the slums for a week or two after dark in his watchful care.

Mona, Mary and Carson Visit the Slums.

The other stared in the direction of the call, his attitude showing amazement as he recognized Carson. Then with a swinging stride he crossed the street.

"What in the name of Heaven brings you here?" he demanded. "I want you to meet two young friends of mine," said Carson, smiling at the other's dubious expression.

"Miss Burnett and she, please, allow me to present my good friend, Rodney Grant of The Star. Mr. Grant is one of the most capable and capable newspaper reporters I have ever known—and I have had experience with a good many."

"Forget it," laughed Grant, shaking hands with the two girls, but still unable to cover his surprise, and studying them shrewdly. The young woman, on had dressed for the occasion in rough suits, and hats, which might have fooled a casual passer-by, but which only interested their refinement to a close observer.

"Miss Hartley and Miss Burnett are much interested in the slums," explained Carson, "and have been studying the slums at night under my protection. If you could persuade them to talk, old man, you would have some thrilling stories for you to tell."

"Delighted," said Grant, "if you don't mind waiting until I call the office." The girls waited while the men went to telephone.

For a few moments the two girls surveyed the night scene before them, their attention directed mainly toward the gaudy restaurant across the street. It was Mona who saw first the hesitating young woman who had been plucked face, who had paused before the restaurant, and stood peering fearfully through the window.

The young woman bore the restaurant drew out a coin from a frayed purse in her hand, made a movement as though to throw it away, but she stopped at the cafe, and then drew back with a shudder. With the coin still in her hand, she entered quickly following and watching her, the girl entered a small park and was raising the phial to her lips when Mona caught her and dashed it onto the ground.

"Now," she said acutely, "if you will tell me what it is all about, maybe I can help you." The young woman looked at the young woman with a bitter little laugh. "You are nice one to talk about helping me when you took the only way out of it all from me. Oh, why did you do it? Why didn't you let me take the chance when I had it? Now—" she held out her arm to the girl, and broke into a hysterical laugh.

Mona dropped onto the bench at her side. "It is always blackest just before dawn! I know that it is easy enough to tell you that—and that you probably don't believe it. But if you can persuade yourself to tell me your story, I will promise that if I cannot offer a definite way of help to you, I will buy another bottle of acid for you without a word!"

"You really mean it?" For a moment the young woman sat studying the faces of the two girls, half-revealed in the uncertain rays of the park lights. "The chance it is," she decided abruptly. "I will be with you in ten minutes. That is one consolation!" She plunged into her story nervously.

COPPER MINES ALONG PERKIOMEN

Crusher and Smelter Have Been Ordered For One Operation; Rich Ore

Special to the Telegraph

Pennsburg, Pa., July 22. — Copper mines in the Perkiomen Valley have been opened at Schwenksville, Hendricks and Boyertown.

The Kober mines, in the Ridge road near Woxall, were operated for several weeks, but have been abandoned, not because there is no ore, but because the other three places are so unusually rich. The equipment used at the Kober plant has been moved to Boyertown mines. The three mines have been leased by the Eastern Steel Company, of Pottsville, and are being operated by the Revolutionary War.

The mine at Hendricks is on the farm of James Hiltbeitel, 200 yards west of the Perkiomen creek and the Perkiomen Railroad. From this mine considerable ore has been taken to laboratories for inspection. A crusher and smelter have been ordered.

The shaft is 155 feet deep and the drift being worked is 65 feet long. The six men, employed in the mine, say that the farther they go the richer is the product.

At Schwenksville the drift is a mile long, with the opening along the banks of the Perkiomen creek. This mine is considered the richest of the three. Six men are employed at Schwenksville. Several carloads of machinery have been erected at the mouth of the mine. Both these mines were operated before the Revolutionary War.

The mines at Boyertown were abandoned twelve years ago by the Boyertown Ore Company. The work there is in charge of John Berkinbine, Jr., of Philadelphia, who has installed large floating water pumps, operated by electric pressure system. The shaft at this mine is 715 feet deep.
