Anticipates A Serious Coal Shortage

"It is not our policy to advise coal dealers to stock up. We prefer to permit them to use their own judgment. We are, however, advising all consumers and manufacturers who buy coal direct from us, to accumulate a substantial reserve supply, as we anticipate a very serious shortage of Anthracite coal next Fall and Winter." — Williams and Peters, N. Y. City.

There seems to be no doubt that Anthracite coal will be scarce next winter. The coal mines at the present time have only half enough men and under the new mining agreement they are working eight hours a day instead of nine.

Prices are 30c per ton lower than will be charged after Sept. 1. United Ice & Coal Co., Forster & Cowden Sts., Third & Ross Sts., 15th & Chestnut Sts., Also Steelton, Pa.

WOMEN'S INTERESTS

A GIRL AND A MAN

A New and Vital Romance of City Life
by Virginia Terhune Van de Water

CHAPTER XIII.
AGNES MORLEY ate little luncheon that noon. She had thought that she was hungry before she left the office, but when she reached the street she appreciated that she had some past the time when she was in the habit of eating and really was conscious of no desire for food. Yet she knew it would be foolish to attempt to get through the afternoon without any nourishment.
She paused in the doorway of the great office building and looked down the sunlit street. She remembered that the restaurant to which she and Annie Rooney had gone together was some eight blocks away.
It was now half past one, and the new employe did not want to return to her post later than the other girls. She decided that it would be well for her to seek an eating-place near at hand.
"Is there a decent restaurant anywhere in this neighborhood?" she queried one of the elevator starters, who was just returning from his own luncheon.
"Sure there is," he replied. "Go up to the next corner, then turn to the left and walk half a block."
She followed his directions and entered a place displaying heaps of grape-fruit and several boxes of withered strawberries in the window. Externally it resembled many other lunch rooms bearing names in huge white letters across their glass fronts. Inside the door the resemblance ceased. The tables were covered with worn oilcloth, much splashed with coffee and other beverages.
Waitresses in soiled dresses and spotted aprons called out their orders in stentorian tones to the waiter on the other side of the open slide at the end of the room. Smells of cooking now going on mingled with odors of the dead and gone lunches of many yesterdays.
Agnes seated herself at a table and ordered a chicken sandwich. This at least might look clean, she hoped.
It looked clean enough, but was made of stale bread and dry, tasteless chicken.
A Poor Meal.
"What'll you have to drink?" the waitress asked.
"Only a glass of water," the girl said. Somehow the idea of drinking milk here was not pleasant, and she did not want such tea or coffee as this establishment might afford.
The water was brought in a thick glass with a generous lump of ice. She regarded it gratefully. It looked clean and refreshing.
But as she lifted the glass toward her lips her glance fell upon the rim. This bore the distinct outline of numerous grooves. She looked suddenly that the tumbler had only been refilled, not washed, after each using to-day. She set it down with a sick quail.
"Give me my check, please," she told the waitress faintly.
Reaching the street again, she smiled at her own disgust. "It cost me 10 cents to learn to avoid that kind of place hereafter," she mused. "I would rather go without food than risk a repetition of that experience."
It would have been better, she reflected, to have gone to a drugstore and taken an egg-and-milk shake, yet there was no drugstore any nearer than was the restaurant she and Annie Rooney had visited.
Miss Rooney was already in the outer office and at her desk when Agnes entered. Agnes, going to the closet to hang up her coat and hat, noticed that Mr. Bainbridge's own stenographer was not in her usual place, and that the door of his office stood open. As the newcomer passed Annie the latter commented on this fact.
"Old hard-face isn't coming back this afternoon, I guess," she observed. "She had a headache and asked the boss to let her off. He told Larry just now that he'll have to get one of the other stenographers to take some dictation from him. I bet I won't be the one to do it!"
Before Agnes could reply she heard her name spoken, and turning saw that the red-haired office-boy was at her side.
A New Employer.
"Miss Morley," he announced, "Mr. Bainbridge says that if you have not come back yet he wishes you'd take down a couple of important letters for him. Miss Durkee, his stenographer, is in the know, come on in."
"—I think perhaps Mr. Hale's come in," Agnes stammered. "I haven't been in his office yet, and I am late already. Please explain that to Mr. Bainbridge, will you?"
"Yes, Joe, you go tell him just that," Miss Rooney struck in with decision. "You give him Miss Morley's message straight."
"He won't like it," Joe warned her. "And Mr. Hale's not in yet anyhow." "You're all to the good!" Annie murmured, as the boy moved off. "Don't you let Mr. Bainbridge boss you. He's sure got a cast-iron nerve and he keeps it right with him all the time."
Agnes hurried away without acknowledging these comments. Entering Mr. Hale's office, she found it empty, as she had known it would be. It was not yet the hour at which he had said he expected to return.
She closed the door softly behind her and crossing the room hastily, seated herself at her machine and slipped into it a slip of paper. Then she began to work.
"Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party," she pounded out with feverish speed.
Again she began to work, until a quarter of the sheet of paper was covered with the inscription. Then she started another test sentence.
"This is the type of work done by this machine."
This line had been written but three times when the door into the outer office opened and Mr. Bainbridge entered.

BAN ON POOR SON IN LAW

By DOROTHY DIX
Probably the most unpleasant quarter of an hour that a man ever spends is that in which he faces a cold and unromantic father and asks him for his daughter's hand in marriage. Of course, if there are extenuating circumstances in the way of money or position—if he can offer the girl a country place and automobiles—the situation is robbed of much of its fitfulness, and the parental blessing is a foregone conclusion.
If, however, he is an impecunious youth with nothing to give his wife but the love of his heart, and the work of his hands, he would face a galling gun with less trepidation than the old man's stern inquiry: "Young man, can you support my daughter in the style in which she has been accustomed to live?"
Of course, a father is doing no more than his duty, if he strictly within his rights, when he tries to protect his daughter from grinding poverty, but when he goes further than that and objects to a worthy man simply because he is poor, he is doing wrong. He is demanding that the young man start in where he is leaving off, because he can't get any further within his rights, and I own you may thank him for that.

THE TRUTH ABOUT ECZEMA AND PILES

Dear Miss Fairfax:
I am deeply in love with a young man, a very good friend of my brother's. I do not know whether my love is returned. Would you think it proper for me to tell him of my love, as I usually have conversations with him, or let my brother have a talk with him?
ANXIOUS.
You will be making a very grave mistake if either you or your brother tries to force this situation. What you will probably succeed in doing will be to estrange this friend of your brother's and to lose the interest he now shows in you. Why not wait until he develops enough regard for you to show it rather than thrust your feelings upon him?

Directs His Ashes Be Buried With Two Wives

Special to the Telegraph
Washington, Pa., Aug. 10.—James S. Stocking, 77 years, former legislator, county clerk of courts, Civil War veteran and one of the wealthiest men of Washington, was buried under the provisions of his will which are extremely unusual.
The portion of his will relating to his burial follows: "I direct that my body shall be cremated, and no religious services shall be held on my body, ashes or grave. I direct that my ashes shall be divided in two parts and placed in two strong and air and water tight urns, one to be buried in my first wife's grave, and the other in the grave of my second wife."
