A Detective Story of Mystery, Love and Adventure.

A hunted look came to the eyes of the manager as he opened the door of his office. The half dozen of the newspaper men hurriedly entered. The editor stated: "The buzz of conversation came to their ears. Carl turned the reporters away with a snapped oath, and led his companions to a side entrance of the hotel."

Thornley Colton stepped from the elevator. His thin cane located an open door, and he stopped an inch or so from the overturned table. "Thorough, at least," he observed, and his delicate nostrils quivered as he sniffed the close air of the tight-shut rooms. His finely chiseled lips were the faintest of smiles as he realized the lengths the captain had gone when the blind man had telephoned his boasts that he would find something.

The district attorney was the first to move. The police captain had to jump to get ahead of him. "A hair," Colton said. "A single hair."

"Right!" Colton dropped it carefully in the tub. "In the shadow it was utterly impossible to see the hair, but my fingers, so sensitive that they could have located unerringly that same hair through several sheets of note paper, found it instantly."

Colton's came tapped the edge of the tub lightly. "A porcelain tub," he said. "That mark under the left arm, which your lack of imagination told you had been caused by the heavy club, was made when the body was jammed tightly against the round side of this tub, as one hand on the shoulder held it in position and the other gripped the wrist to hold it over the drain. A simple turning of the body as to this tub, and there wasn't a bit of evidence."

was nothing left to see! All a criminal has to fight is eyes. A simple cotton glove will defeat the most elaborate Bertillon bureau in the world. Naturally, the murdered man wore gloves. Do you suppose that detail would be overlooked, after months of preparation?"

"Theory!" snapped the captain. "All theory!" "But you'll concede it pretty well borne out by the fact - Don't turn off that hot water!" The sharp words caused the detective to straighten up suddenly.

Colton lowered the cane that had held him of the movement. From his pocket he took a handkerchief. He bent over swiftly, rubbed the cloth over the metal cross pieces in the tub outlet, and pulled his hand quickly from under the warm stream of water. "See that!" "See that!" he jerked, holding out the handkerchief. "See the evidence of blood there! That proves it!"

"Great God!" The exclamation burst from Manager Carl. "This proves it!" Colton dropped the handkerchief into the tub and turned the tap. "If I wasn't blind I would have found that. But I know that every man who commits a crime works to destroy the evidence that eyes will see. The murderer in this case turned off the tap the minute the last sign of blood disappeared from the tub, and considered himself perfectly safe. But he didn't know that the sections of that drain guard that are in every bathtub would hold a few of the coagulated corpuscles which would soften again when the hot water ran. Eyes would never have seen them, because they would never have been there for the glass wouldn't have shown them because of their position. Perfectly safe, except for a blind man!"
