Silver Sandals
 A Detective Story of Mystery, Love and Adventure.
 By Clinton H. Staggs
 Copyright, W. J. Watt & Co., International News Service.
 "Don't move!" Colton's command came in a sibilant whisper. They waited for the last weird move in the whole weird game. Silent they sat around the vaulted room and stared upward at the curious thing in the ceiling that had been covered with the heavy design. The light on its straight silver tube swayed back and forth from the center of the hinged door that had opened.
 Like a black shadow the crow flew in through the window. Once more they watched it, not daring to move, lest they disturb it. But the bird paid no attention. It flew ceilingward. Its bill poked at a dangling led, pulled it, then darted to another. To Sydney's mind, as he watched, came the picture of the crow as he had seen it in the wet-bag hall. He pulled the cord that had opened the curtains to the room where he had lost all recollection of things. From one cord led to another the crow darted, apparently without rhyme or reason jerking one at one side and then a leg connected with another bird before it flew back. With a sudden scream it flew downward to perch on the table. The square of silver swung slowly downward. Resting on two bars was a heavy box.
 "The puzzle," Colton said. "The crow was the key that unlocked them. If you will look in the tree you will probably find a clever crossing of fine wires in the hiding place of the crow. The simple iron of the metal feather on them closed the electric circuit that opened the first door. Clever, yes, but a man who could build the supporting frame, the floor, the John Neilton into the Beaumonde Restaurant was clever enough to do anything." His voice became very solemn. "Anything but to solve the higher mystery," he said softly.
 Once more Thornley Colton was in the darkened library of the old, brownstone house. Once more his burning eyes were swathed in bandages. In the darkness sat the district attorney and Sydney Thames. It was several hours after the scene at the house in Doughkeepsie. Carl, still cool, was in a cell at police headquarters. Norman was in another. On the streets newsboys were yelling the damp extras with Police Captain McMann's name spread in great type over the first pages. At Poughkeepsie Silver Sandals, the girl, and Bracken were beginning new life that had opened before them in the upper room of the Colton house shrimp was petting Rameses. It had been given him by the old woman, and was the only fee that had come for the long hours of work and risk and pain.
 "There is one thing that puzzled me," declared the district attorney slowly. "How did Bracken get out of the dining-room at the Beaumonde?"
 The darkness hid Colton's smile. "He walked out," he said. "It was the simplest thing in the world. He was in a dress suit. He sauntered leisurely into the lobby when he saw that the captain's eyes were not on him after he had apparently hurried away to carry out an order of the girl. He presented a hat check that he had arranged for, got his hat, and sauntered out. Then he got the car he had left near by, and was all ready for the girl.
 Sydney put in a question: "But I remember that the eyes of the old man were very bright. I noticed them."
 "Silver Sandals told me of that, while we were waiting for the time to come for the denouement. It was a chemical he had discovered that was used by the ancient Egyptians for their mummies. He had discovered another secret, in his years of research, that the old embalmers used. It prevents stiffness of dead joints. The incense that they used for just as was the making of papyrus for all his writing. He wouldn't have so modern a thing as paper."
 Silence for a few minutes, then the district attorney put another question: "The woman found the body, with the slashed wrists, beside the tub?"
 "Yes, but, as Carl said, she merely thought that her brother had taken the thing into his own hands. It didn't seem strange at all to her. She was a curious woman, strange as the old man himself. And you must remember that she was doing nothing else she could do. She did not dare mention the fact of it being suicide, because that would mean the police, and explanations of the things they had done. I think that was the real cause of the nervousness that she never let the girl suspect."
 "Reading of the coroner's inquest and the police surgeon's testimony showed her that it was very true. But still she dared do nothing. She thought that only Bracken could be guilty. I accused him of the murder to draw her out. Naturally, she thought that he had stolen the program map. But she figured he had only done that to see that it was the girl who got the check book. She told me those things at the Bracken house. Of course young Bracken was nearly crazy. He was trying to locate Norman as the only one who could be guilty. Then, when he heard the woman as I intended he should, he thought that she had killed her brother because of the long-nursed scheme of revenge."
 "Thank God it all came out right!" There was fervent thankfulness in the official's exclamation. "This morning my nerves were raw. I realized what a slip meant to me. Now I'm clear. McMann will see that it doesn't come out. Election's only a little way off."
 Once more the darkness hid the smile that curved his thin lips of the blind man. "Isn't it very true," he said quietly, "that we can't go backward? The old man thought he was living in the centuries that were dead and gone. Yet modernism thrust its way in. Wall Street, money, speculation, caused his murder, though he knew nothing of them. You have been worrying over election ballots, and newspapers. But time halts for no man, nor can it be pushed back a second." He rose from the desk and dipped the bottle in the solution of boric acid he had been using since his return to relieve the burning of hours. "Sleep is the only thing that is worrying me. It is only about thirty-seven hours since John Neilton sat at his table; but even have come swiftly. I'm tired, very tired, and my eyes haven't had sleep for fifty hours. I was up early day before yesterday. For eyes that are dead and useless, they cause a lot of trouble—a lot of trouble!" he finished, with grim emphasis.
