CHINESE NEWSPAPERS AND SCHOOLS CHINESE NEWSPAPERS AND SCHOOLS

Estimates regarding literacy vary from five per cent. of the entire population to seventy per cent. of the male population, but more and more are coming to read, as transportation methods and communication by telegraph and post office are being improved. A newspaper now costs as much as a meal in many parts of China, and this is not conducive to literacy nor unity of sentiment; but a single paper serves a much larger group of readers than with ourselves. Literacy is the most necessary step toward national unity, and education is the most needed reform. Even those students who do not appreciate the efforts of evangelistic missions testify sincerely to the great value of American educational missionary work. Not only are American mission schools prominent in the present educational system in China, but more such schools are urged by the Chinese.—The Christian Herald.
