In choosing "Imperial Britain" as the title for his next traveloge, Burton Holmes fully conduct his audiences by the sun-that-never sets" route all the way around the most far-flung imperial proposition that the world has ever known. He will carry his audiences to the many interesting points of tourist travel and by numberless comparatively untraveled by-ways, through England, Scotland and Ireland and thence, crossing the Atlantic, make a flying trip across the great Trans-Atlantic Dominion, pausing to see such points of interest as were necessarily slighted in the first two traveloges of his series.

"Anton, the Terrible," is an unusual story of the Russian Secret Service Police; an attempt to betray Russia to Germany; the love of two young people and how they (while in jail) work out by secret code their salvation as well as that of their country, and the dramatic but quite invitable end of "Anton, the Terrible," makes this photoplay one of the dramatic sensations of the day.

GOOD LECTURE

Second of Five Travelogs Heard Last Night; Beauti-

Burton Holmes last night continued his Travelogs, the subject for the evening being a trip through the Canadian Rockies, the Switzerland of North America. The same delightful beauties of travel was theirs last night who attended, as was on the night of the previous lecture. Burton Holmes is a lecturer extraordinary who with motion picture and slides illustrates his talk. His pictures are, to express it most mildly, wonderful, especially his new slides made by the direct photography process which shows the photography process which shows the colors just as Nature has them. Several of the slides were again shown last night, and their value demonstrated by comparison with hand-colored slides. This second, of the five lectures Mr. Holmes will give in this city, was possibly more interesting than the first in that the travel was a bit more concentrated and therefore the more easily followed by the audience. Much of travel lore, seenic beauty and customs foreign to our own is to be learned from these Travelogs as is attested by the genuine enthusiasm expressed by each audience.
