"It is thus that loyalty is rewarded," sighed Tommy. "No matter what I start, I get the worst of it. Billy, why didn't you get to the dance?"

"The culprit cast a guilty glance at Geraldine, but he met only the brightest and freest of smiles. By jinks, she was well got up to-night! One of those soft, shimmering, pink, fluffy, filmy, lacy dinner gowns, pearls around her neck, and in her gold-brown hair. Her eyes, too! He had never seen them so snappy. It was as if there were a smoldering fire in them.

"I'll make a clean breast of it and take my licking," he offered. "It started with Miss Stuart." Geraldine missed her shot, and stood back leaning gracefully on her cue.

"Terrible affair!" Tommy's tone was perfectly serious; as he came over to the table, his face was grave. That look of astonishment which Geraldine had followed had followed her as quickly as she.

"That is what drove Mr. Doe to drink," finished Billy, in his most sympathetic tones and with a gleam was wound up in his eye. The thing was wound up in his eye. The gleam was wound up in his eye.

"Well, rather!" Billy lounged over by Geraldine and sat down beside her. Tommy took a pace with the elaboration of out players who were likely to miss ten times and then run up a string of fifty. Geraldine's hand lay on the arm of her chair, and Billy put his own over it.

"How is he connected with her?" Geraldine had developed into a good listener. It was a new trait in her. Billy, however, caught his breath. He was a muddle again, and he was the more confused in that Tommy, already started on one of his aggravating runs, waited for an answer.

"Well, it was Mr. Doe who suggested that if there was another Harrison Stuart book it should be published. He breathed freely again. Tommy went with his game.

"So that's why you couldn't come to the dance."

Good Politics? "I'd call it mighty good politics in a way," said one veteran fire fighter. "Just think these motorized machines will appear on the streets—I've no doubt some sort of 'demonstration' will be arranged—just about the time campaign talk is in the air."

Short Sightedness In referring to the evident loss which the city will sustain as a result of the shortsightedness of Council, Mr. Halbert pointed out that when Fire Chief Kindler, Mr. Taylor and himself mapped out a tentative program a year ago, provision for the motorization of the department with new machines had been considered.

The Difference to the City Mr. Gross, according to his advertisement, purposes to buy "one or more" new fire engines, to equip the old sixty-five-foot Hayes truck that has been in city service for thirty years with a tractor drive, and to buy but one new service truck.
