WHAT DAY-OLD CHICKS MEAN TO THE POULTRY INDUSTRY

An Application of the Great Principle of Specialization

Boon to Amateurs and Small Growers Who Want the Benefit of High-Grade Equipment

By M. L. CHAPMAN

Judge, Breeder and Writer.
Commercial baby chick hatching is not a modern industry, in the strict sense of the term, though in recent years it has become very popular, and one of the foremost branches of poultry culture. Commercial hatcheries were in vogue long before the Christian era. Historians tell us the Egyptians made it a business to hatch and supply day-old chicks to farmers, who often traveled long distances for them. Baby chick hatcheries were also very active in China centuries ago. The methods of these ancients, however, were of considerable difference. It was the practice in Egypt to place eggs for hatching on the floor of a cave-like building and supply the heat from an adjoining room. In China the eggs were placed in large baskets or jars, carefully covered, and then set aside to receive the action of the heat of the sun.

A few years ago, shortly after the perfection of mammoth incubators heated by hot water, with capacities up to 20,000 eggs for a single machine, commercial baby chick hatcheries were started in this country. These mammoth incubators made it possible to hatch chicks economically, and poultrymen were quick to take advantage of them. To-day there are farms with incubators having a capacity of over 200,000 eggs.

Chick Producers are Specialists

Besides being a specialist in incubating, the successful baby chick producer has eggs of high fertility and strong germinating power to make the baby chick department a paying proposition. Strong, healthy, vigorous breeding stock is the only means of securing eggs of high fertility and strong germinating properties. And it is the quality of their breeding stock that the reputation of a farm rests. Buy, look for this quality.

Importance of Strong Fertility

Fertility is the greatest factor in selecting eggs for hatching and the success of the hatch.

How Chicks are Shipped

The uniform safety with which chicks are shipped is another factor in favor of the development of the baby chick industry. Baby chicks may be shipped any distance provided the destination is reached within thirty-six hours. This can be done in 24 hours, so much as the time required, which affects the safety of the chicks. Baby chicks should not be fed during the first thirty-six hours. During this period they should be kept quiet and allowed to sleep. At the hatcheries the chicks are packed in boxes ventilated in such a manner as to provide comfortable quarters for the chicks, and unless they are roughly handled or placed where they will be subject to draughts or intense heat the chicks will be perfectly comfortable and hearty when they reach their destination.

Most Farms Guarantee Safe Arrival

Because of the rigid requirements of the successful baby chick producer this branch of the industry is bound to grow larger each year. It will relieve the small poultryman of the necessity of maintaining a hatching department. It gives the amateur the result of the stock, equipment and experience of the expert, and places him in a position to secure any number of chicks of any variety, at almost any season of the year, and at a nominal cost. These advantages must be recognized. At the present writing there are farms which previously kept a breeding flock and produced their own chicks which are now replenishing their laying flock with baby chicks from the commercial hatcheries.

Other farms have closed out their equipment to raising pullets and broiler stock and have devoted their entire resources to the raising of baby chicks. They are termed pullet raisers. These poultrymen secure their stock from the commercial hatcheries and brood the chicks. Later the pullets are segregated and graded for sale, while the cockerels are specially fattened for the broiler trade. The pullets are sold at any age desired by the buyer. This branch of the poultry industry is finding favor among women situated in the suburban and rural
