

OF INTEREST TO THE WOMEN

"THEIR MARRIED LIFE"

Ned's proposition had left Warren sarcastic and Helen timorous...

Ned having thrown the bomb, waited to see what would happen...

"No, Warren, No!" said Helen quickly. "Ned spoke of the position and I told him that I could not take it..."

"But you said you would consider it?" "No, I told Ned definitely that I would not dream of taking it, but your manner infuriated me..."

"Well, if you told Ned definitely that you would not take the position," Warren returned, "why does he insist upon it?"

"I'll answer that question if you don't mind," put in Ned imperturbably. "I thought that it would be only fair to Helen to get your opinion on the matter..."

"I suppose you mean that by refusing to consider Helen as an office fixture I am interfering with her freedom of action?"

"Well, I really wanted Helen for this position, and I thought it would be a good chance for her..."

"And with these words Ned turned the topic of conversation to something general and shortly after went. There was nothing else for him to do..."

HANDSOME COAT FOR WINTER WEAR

Belted-in Plaits Give Good Lines to This Girl's Coat

By MAY MANTON

This is as handsome a coat as the girl can wear. Here it is made of dark green velours and it is trimmed with champagne colored broadcloth...

"You're not interested any longer in the life you are leading and in knowing the women you have known?"

"I think every woman should be independent," Helen returned. "You are not answering my question."

"Well, Warren, what Ned says is true. I have the time. Men seldom come home to lunch. Mary is here to look after the house..."

"You are considering it," Warren said. "I thought you were not taking the position excepting for the fact that you object."

"Then you are considering it," Warren said. "I thought you were not taking the position excepting for the fact that you object."

"You are looking at it all wrong, dear," Helen said gently. "At first the idea frightened me; but now that I have become used to it, it certainly has an appeal..."

"Of course Warren knew it—he had known it all along—but he was not content to leave well enough alone."

"You are all excited with the idea that perhaps you can do something, aren't you?" he sneered. "Well, don't flatter yourself. Don't imagine for a moment that Ned Burns offered you that position because you have talent..."

That was a busy week in the enchanted apartment, a busy and a proud week, for the papers were full of nothing but the marvelous romance of Harrison Stuart, of his tremendous achievement of his dignified position in the world of structural engineering...

English Firm May Yet Get Navy Shell Order

Washington, D. C., Jan. 31.—Contracts for more than $3,000,000 worth of armor-piercing shells let by the Navy to Hadfields, Limited, an English concern, may be filled despite the British government's order that that company should not proceed with the work "so long as the exigencies of war continue."

A dispatch from Ambassador Page at London, transmitted by the State department, said that while the British authorities felt constrained to withhold consent for the Hadfields to make the shells for the present on account of national needs as understood by the public, officials of the concern were reasonably sure that objection would disappear within twelve or fifteen months. Even after that delay, the dispatch said, it probably would be possible to deliver the projectiles within the time stipulation originally made by the company...

Inasmuch as the shells are to be held in reserve, there being no immediate need for them, navy officials are of the opinion that they can afford to await further developments and hold the contract in abeyance for some time.

There were other speeches, some droning and dry, some frivolous and enlivening, some tensely interesting from a technical standpoint; but late, towards the close of the evening, when the ladies in the gallery were painfully fighting off drowsiness, and Tommy Tinkle was doing everything he could to keep Tavy and Mrs. Stuart awake, there suddenly burst a new voice at the assembly...

"Whisky!" The tones were startling in their coarse raucousness. "It's the curse of the world! The voice rose to a scolding shriek. 'There is no ill but whisky! Drink! It's the enemy of man and God! It burns the body and it sears the brain! Whisky!'"

There was a shriek from the ladies' gallery. It was not Harrison Stuart who swayed there, his face flushed and puffed, his bearded eyes half closed, and his lips formless; but a beast, an animal, a thing from another world. It was Bow-Wow!

CHAPTER XXXII In the Silence of Black Night They wanted to wait for him, those two stricken women in the gallery, to take him home with them, for in their hearts was no resentment, only pity. But Tommy Tinkle would not let them. He sent word to Billy that he should sit in the gallery with them home, and said what consoling things he could. It was not much of a lapse, it was more excitement than anything else, Billy would have him sit right in the morning, such things were to be expected, and wasn't it a stunning speech that Billy made!

Yes, such things were to be expected, and that was the awful tragedy of it. Again the spectral shadow of the past, its firm seat in the blue eyes and the dark gray, and the Stuart women took up the allotment nature had made for them.

Billy telephoned them shortly after they reached home. Hal was resting quite comfortably now. He had not drunk very much. He had sipped at the champagne without knowing it, and then he had taken some of the brandy, and of course, with the taste of that on his tongue, he did not quite realize what he was doing. He'd been in the morning, and, after all, it was more the excitement than anything else.

But Billy knew better. Hal's first act, when they had left him alone for a moment to prepare his bed and his medicine, had been to rouse from a seeming lethargy and snatch the decanter! Burke came back in time to seize it from him; but already he had swallowed a couple of tumblers full, and laughing with a gurgle in his throat, he let them put him to bed. Almost as soon as he laid his head on the pillow, he dropped into a profound stupor.

"It's a damn shame—beg your pardon, sir—after the fight he's made," this was Burke, and he helped Billy off with his coat and vest, and then he'll sit up and watch him. "I expect you'd better," decided Billy, and he put Hal's hands under the covers. The window had been opened, and it was rather cold in the blue room. "Call me if he's any trouble."

So Billy, heavy-hearted, went to bed, and Burke made himself comfortable in robe and slippers, and put another log on the fire in the big lounging-room, and sat with pipe and paper. Mr. Stuart slept very well, indeed. Burke went in to look at him about two or three, and once, by accident, he dropped a couple of pills on a terrific clang; but there was no waking the man. Burke went back and sat on the big leather couch, and he looked at the clock, and thought on the Widow Maloney's particular satisfaction; for he had carefully concealed from her that in two weeks he would be sailing over the seas and far away, with Mr. Billy and his pretty bride. Otherwise, she determined Nora might marry him. Two more weeks! Pretty little Miss Tavy, God bless her, would make a beautiful bride, and she was a royal princess, she was a sweet-minded lady, God bless her, would move into the new house, and Harrison Stuart would come into his own again; and might be always as happy, and prosperous—and safe!

pleasantly musing, Burke nodded his head lower and lower, and fell into the dead sleep of them who sit up late at night.

That numb carcass which was Bow-Wow stirred uneasily. Something was wrong. There is no resisting the ultimate command of the body. When that command comes, and the soul goes into existence. When it has reached its time to die, the mind and the soul have no say in the matter; so, in this life, the body is always supreme. It demands to be fed, to have its thirst quenched, to lie in slothful slumber; and if it be refused these things, it ousts mind and soul.

The body of Bow-Wow commanded his mind to awaken; and it did, awakened to its full strength, to its full intellectual capacity, to the full measure of its understanding; and all those mental powers were compressed in one muttered word, which broke huskily upon the silence of black night: "Whisky!"

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Cured Mrs. Copner after Doctor's Failed.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—"I want you to know the good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I was in such bad health from female troubles that I could hardly get off my bed. I had been doctoring for a long time and my mother said, 'I want you to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.' So I did, and it has certainly made me a well woman. I am able to do my house work and am so happy as I never expected to go around the way I do again, and I want others to know what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me."

—Mrs. JOSIE COPNER, 1688 Harrison Ave., Fairmount, Cincinnati, Ohio.
