The music last night was interesting as a psychological study of the national spirit of two nations—Germany and Russia. There is no denying that Wagner's music has the strident military flavor, the boldness, the assurance of unconquerable and enduring strength; while the Russians represented gave us the impression that the sad minor key—not always present, but predominating—is the tone index of a people, naturally strong and happy, but made morbid by the leash of fear. The scherzo movement revealed agaety in a minor key—the spirit of Russia at play and frolic—the swiftmoving horse and sleigh, the winter sports, the slow and graceful dance—sin in short, nationalism in music. The final movement contains the same theme used in the first, but is detveloped through clever contrapuntal effects, and brought to an impressive and thrilling close. While the symphony could not be classed as profound, or entirely logical in its construction, yet it has many beautiful moments, and it stirs the blood. Repeated hearings will reveal new beauties and more coherency, especially in the first and fourth movements.

beauties and more coherency, especially in the first and fourth movements.

The incidental music to "Les Perses" was interesting. The first number revealed some beautifully woven string effects and the "Air de Ballet" was opened by probably the greatest flautist in the world. George Barrare. It was a treat to hear a first-class artist play the flute. Mention must also be made of the andante cantabile by Tschaikowsky and the march from "Le Cog d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Extras twere demanded and Grier's "Peer Gynt" suite was drawn on for "Anitra's Dance" and the "Hall of the Mountain King."

Althouse True Artist
The large audience also had the pleasure of hearing Paul Althouse, tenor, of the Metropolitan Opera Company. "Celeste Aida" is always a good medium for the introduction of a well-equipped tenor. There are tenors who make of this aria a noisy, sensuous and nasal monstrosity, and the people applaud it, thereby encouraging the growth of what has become a vocal disease and a deterioration of artistic singing.
