EARLIEST SETTLEMENT IN AMERICA TO BEAR NAME OF WASHINGTON

OLD GUARD HOUSE AT CARLISLE

Old Guard House at Indian School is Only Building Left of Washingtonburg

Carlisle, Pa., Feb. 22.—The earliest settlement in America to bear the name of Washington has almost vanished. This fact was brought to-day in exercises commemorating the birthday of the first president, held in Carlisle. Only one small building now remains of the once busy military center of Washingtonburg, the name applied to a settlement on the outskirts of Carlisle, where the Carlisle Barracks and still later the Carlisle Indian School were located.

The name of the place, although rich in history and tradition, is but little known and is mentioned in no histories, either State or national. It was founded, according to local historians, during the early days of the Revolutionary War. On Christmas night, 1776, Washington crossed the Delaware and fell upon the Hessians at Trenton, capturing 1,000 prisoners. First taken to York, they were later brought to Carlisle, when an attack was feared by way of Baltimore. On the outskirts of this town a complete set of buildings was erected at central expense by these Hessian prisoners. This was the formal founding of Washingtonburg, so named in honor of the great general.

Although small, Washingtonburg was a very busy place, having workshops for the manufacture of military supplies, which were sent to the northern and southern divisions of the continental army, a hospital, boarding houses, magazine and guardhouse. Later it became an army post and many of the most distinguished officers of the country received their early training there.

The invasion of Pennsylvania by the Confederates in 1863 marked the end of Washingtonburg. General Ewell entered the town on June 27 and made his headquarters at the barracks. He withdrew and the Union forces returned. Later, after a junction with General Fitzhugh Lee, the Confederates returned and shelled the town, setting fire to the barracks and completely destroying all buildings except the guardhouse and the home of Major Sumner. Although partially restored, the place sank in importance until about thirty-five years ago, when it was chosen as a site for the first Indian school in the East.

Although the school is still in the building now remaining of the old town is the former guardhouse at the Indian school, a massive stone structure with walls five feet thick.
