BLACK LANGSHANS

This distinctive breed of fowls was exported to Europe chiefly through England. From the Langshan district in China came the first big beautiful black fowls which bear the name Langshans. As such they were known until in later importations white and mottled Langshans were found. Then the first Langshans were found. Then the first Langshans were distinguished by affixing Black. History does not record their date or manner of origin.

The great size of this breed and its wonderful laying qualities made it a favorite in England. Its fame spread to Anistralia and the United States and the fowls followed their fame. Many were imported from England and Australia had much to do with their decline in popularity. In Australia a pen of Langshans in a laying competition extending over a year, with many varieties of poultry represented, won first place with the highest total of eggs laid.

In America they are widely bred in the South and probably some of the very best specimens exhibited in our poultry shows are from that section.

This fowl belongs to the Asiatic family, which it resembles in size and weight. Mature specimens weigh to 12 pounds for males, and to 12 pounds for males. The hens will in confinement or on range, and are good winter layers of large brown eggs, and all ages make good table poultry.
