"This may sound like an extravagant statement, but the figures are startling. Professor Willcox of Cornell University has for some time been engaged in analyzing the death rate of the male population of New York State as revealed by the census statistics. The following table shows the percentage of deaths, among the unmarried and the married:

They prove conclusively that men who have homes, who eat, live and sleep regularly, who have proper attention when they are ill, and a constant incentive to good work, outlive single men. Between the ages of thirty and fifty the death rate is more than twice as great among bachelors."
