Hints German Revolution

Philip Scheidemann, member of the Reichstag, is perhaps the boldest of the well-known men of Germany, for, in the meeting of that body the other day, he said if France and England renounced the idea of annexation there would be a revolution in Germany. He meant the German people would rise against the Kaiser should he oppose peace under such conditions. Such opinions publicly expressed would have been followed by imprisonment earlier in the war.

WHISKY TO GO FOR WAR PERIOD

Senators Favor Brewing of Beer Because of Big Revenue

Washington, May 23.—When the Senate takes up the Gore food bill, dealing with control of the alcoholic output, it is expected that whisky will be dealt a fatal blow. The Senate is understood to be ready to vote almost as a whole against the use of grain for alcoholic drinks during the war.

What whisky the manufacturers now have, it is contended by the Senate, ought to be the limit of supply for the country. While some rabid prohibitionists would like to see all alcoholic drinks cut off, the majority are not disposed to deprive the Government at the time it needs all the war revenue it can get, of the tax from malted drinks. A senator familiar with present tendencies to attempt to jam through the varied prohibition amendments, informed the press to-day that the majority of senators will not countenance shutting off the entire revenue obtained from the manufacture of alcohols.

Expected Stiff Fight The Government's revenue from malted drinks, the senator said, is $120,000,000 a year, and an effort will be made to prevent them being put on the prohibited list. He admitted that undoubtedly there will be a stiff fight for the broadest prohibition, including beers, but he believed the Senate would hold out against it.

To put the country upon a drastic prohibition basis would mean cutting off $500,000,000 from the war revenue derived from alcoholic drinks, almost the biggest item in the entire revenue. While this senator confessed himself an ardent prohibitionist, he saw the advantage to the country in putting it upon a modified prohibition basis by allowing the brewing of beers and the output of wine.

To shut down on whisky, he said, would deprive the Government of approximately $380,000,000, but the argument raised was tenable in that it is intended to conserve the supply of grains. Legislation aimed at saving the country's food supply, he said, was entirely practicable, even though it took away a large slice of revenue.

But the situation on beer and other malted drinks was different, and there was no consideration of saving foodstuffs. The principal ingredient, he pointed out, is barley, and that does not form an item of the nation's food.
